Assad's onslaught against his own people has continued despite protestations at the UN and in the face of the close-at-hand presence of Arab League monitors and even that of Russia's foreign minister earlier this month. Could there be a clearer insight into the pitiless heart and ruthless intentions of the man than this unabating, gruesome slaughter week after week, month after month?

That Assad apparently receives his moral counsel from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, that he apparently relies on one of Ahmadinejad's top military commanders to help direct the carnage, tell us that the Syrian ruler considers mass murder a legitimate survival policy option.

One of the most unsettling reports of the many jarring ones of the Syrian bloodletting that have reached the West emanated recently from UNICEF.

"The UN Children's Fund says hundreds of children have been victims during Syria's violence. It says there are reports of children being arbitrarily arrested, tortured and sexually abused while in detention," Voice of America reported Feb. 7. "UNICEF spokeswoman Marixie Mercado says her organization is also dismayed at shelling by government forces of civilian neighbourhoods in the city of Homs over the past few days. She says this undoubtedly is causing more suffering for more children."

Mercado said that the latest numbers "available through the local human rights organizations working in Syria on children dead and in detention are over 400 dead and also over 400 in detention as the end of January."

This sorrowful piece of news must not be glossed over. Some 400 children arbitrarily arrested. Tortured. Sexually abused. Some 400 children murdered!

Thankfully, a great many in the West and in the Middle East are outraged. They condemn Assad and call for his ouster. The outcry is a shriek of disgust at Assad's barbarity.

But there are some individuals in the West – usually noted for the hair trigger on their respective consciences that quickly yields to umbrage and offence – who have remained quietly unaffected throughout Assad's embrace of mayhem and killing.

Where, for example, is the outcry from the members of the Canada Boat to Gaza campaign, the high moralists whose consciences are wounded by Israel's blockade of Hamas-run Gaza?

Their website proclaims that they aim "at publicizing the cruelty, illegality and inhumanity of Israel's blockade over the people of Gaza." What about the cruelty, illegality and inhumanity of Assad's assault on his own people, we must ask.

That Israel's blockade is neither cruel, illegal nor inhumane is irrelevant to them. Goods and products of all sorts, including consumer, construction, and tons of humanitarian aid, flow each week into Gaza from many points of entry through Israel and now, too, through Egypt. But facts do not matter to the predetermined beliefs of the Canada Boat to Gaza crowd. What matters most to them is the guiding sanctity of their ideology and, in some cases, too, their prejudice. But search every inch of the group's website and you will not find a word, let alone a sentence, of concern for the people and more pitiably, the children of Syria.

One of the most famous signatories on the list of endorsers of the Canada Boat to Gaza told The CJN in an e-mail exchange last year that his concern was for the children of Gaza, and indeed, for children everywhere.

Renowned American author Alice Walker also joined the Freedom Flotilla II to Gaza last year because she wanted "justice and respect" for Palestinian children. "One child must never be set above another," Walker wrote in explaining her actions.

We are entitled now to question the sincerity of their beliefs. For it is clear they do set some children above others.

The slaughter of Syria's innocent lambs evokes only silence from these hypocrites.

Judy Feld Carr receives Israel's Presidential Medal

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Judy Feld Carr, a human rights activist who was responsible for the rescue of more than 3,200 Jews from Syria from the early 1970s until 2001, is one of six honorees to be awarded Israel's first Presidential Medal.

The announcement was made at a press conference at President Shimon Peres' residence on Feb. 9. The medal honours individuals who have made significant contributions to Israel's society and its global image.

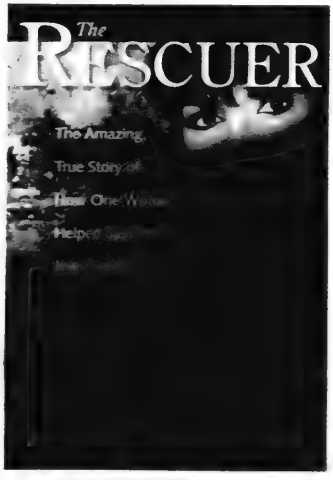
Judy Feld Carr

Others honorees are diplomat Henry Kissinger; Uri Slonim, chairman of the Variety Israel charity; philosopher Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz; the Rashi Foundation and Zubin Mehta, director of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

Feld Carr, who along with her husband, Donald Carr, publisher of The CJN, has six children and 13 grandchildren, said in an interview that being honoured was a "big surprise. I was in the grocery store when the call came from Israel. I immediately said 'yes.' It's a huge honour, and I am in very good company."

To this day, Feld Carr, a retired music professor who was raised in Sudbury, Ont., said in an interview, "I cannot digest what I was really doing."

The saga began when she and her first husband, Dr. Ronald Feld – who died when she was 33 – learned that 12 young Jewish men died trying to escape from Syria.



Together with some friends, they decided to take up the cause of Syrian Jewry and made one phone call to the chief rabbi of Syria. It was the only phone call ever made to Syria from the Jewish community.

The rabbi told them Syrian Jews needed religious books, she said.

"I sent them boxes of books because I wanted them to know that we were thinking about them."

That led to a communication with some families, and she learned about the arrests and torture that many suffered. She wanted to help, she said.

Much of the money that was needed was raised through the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands, established at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"[For all those years] I was living two lives. I travelled to different countries to undertake secret negotiations, and I was a mother and wife. I was the first woman president of Beth Tzedec, an executive of Canadian Jewish Congress, and I attended community dinners. I didn't let my one life [interfere] with the other. It was difficult making my lives so separate, but I learned to be an actress."

She would be basting a brisket, she said, when a call would come through about a Syrian Jew. "I talked and I basted. I had to do it all. I had many sleepless nights."

Everything was done secretly, and even now people still know very little, she said. "Absolutely nobody knows how I got people out of Syrian prisons. I never made a call. I never initiated contact. They had to find me. [Even though] their lives became intertwined with mine, most have never seen me."

Feld Carr's story is told in a book written by University of Toronto Prof. Harold Troper in 1999 titled The Ransomed of Gods: The Remarkable Story of One Woman's Role in the Rescue of Syrian Jewry. It was republished in 2007 under the title The Rescuer: The Amazing True Story of How One Woman Helped Save the Jews of Syria.

She has received numerous other awards including the Order of Canada, the Queen's Jubilee Medal, the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award of the Canadian Jewish Congress, and the Simon Wiesenthal Award for Tolerance, Justice and Human Rights.

Looking back, said Feld Carr, "nothing that happened really made any sense. Everything [occurred] almost by happenstance."

Centres support kids with emotional, behavourial issues

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When Seth Posluns was a teenager and so overwhelmed by his mental health issues that he had to drop out of school, he never dreamed that just three years later, he'd be living on his own, in the midst of obtaining a physics degree.

Posluns, 21, a second-year University of Guelph student, said he owes much of his success to the Youthdale Treatment Centres.

The Toronto-based, non-profit agency runs group homes – including a Jewish, kosher home – and a summer camp for children who suffer from serious mental health conditions such as depression, anxiety, bipolar disorder and Asperger syndrome.

Posluns, who shared his testimony on Youthdale's website, said his depression and anxiety stems from a serious car accident he survived with his mother when he was 4-1/2.

"I also had this sleeping disorder that was causing me to miss a lot of school," he said in a telephone interview from Guelph, Ont.

"I had a rough time with my parents who really wanted to fix the problem but didn't really know how."

When his social worker suggested he consider moving into a Youthdale group home, he was skeptical.

"One of my fears going in was, 'What is this place going to be like?' It was so far outside of what I was used to."

Posluns made the choice to join Youthdale in 2007, a decision he said was the best he ever made.

"It was scary to leave home and go into this environment with new kids... It was a radical shift and I wasn't even sure it would work, because I didn't even have a proper grasp on what my issues were," he recalled.

But Posluns said he was very receptive to the staff – which includes psychiatrists, psychologists, social workers and nurses – and he responded very well to the treatments.

In addition to living in a group home, Posluns said he also took advantage of Youthdale's overnight summer camp, which is tailored to the needs of their residents.

Camp Magnetawan is a 1,000-acre camp about four hours north of Toronto that has a two-to-one camper-to-staff ratio.

Youthdale staffer Shirley Malanych, who has spent nearly every summer at the camp since it was founded in 1972, said children are able to experience things that boost their self-esteem and social skills.

In some ways, Camp Magnetawan is like any other overnight camp. Campers play sports, take part in drama classes, do arts and crafts, go on canoe trips and sit around campfires.

But this is a camp designed specifically to cater to children who need professional help with their mental health issues.

"The staff are professionals that are taking care of the kids and sleeping in the cabin at night... and giving them a lot of time and attention and support throughout the day," Malanych said.

But it's also about giving the kids an opportunity to let loose, have fun and create lasting memories.

"Whether they're learning how to swim or going on a canoe trip – for people who attend camp that can be a magical experience that lasts a lifetime," she said.

"For some of the kids who have lower self-esteem or family issues or problems, this certainly can help kids... interact with their peers."

Posluns said that for some of his peers who may have been resistant to life in the group home, the camp helped them open up.

"When they got there, they couldn't help but embrace where they are. For the most part, people opened up more and broadened their horizons," he said.

"I got to have experiences I never would have had. I went on these canoe trips and camping trips, and these are really wonderful memories I have now that I wouldn't get to have otherwise."

Seth Posluns, right, with one of the Camp Magnetawan staff

Until last year, Camp Magnetawan was only open to Youthdale residents. Today, any children who feel like they could benefit from the program are welcomed.

"It's a well-structured program. In terms of anyone who might have difficulties, but may not need to live in a residence... I think this might be a good place," Malanych said.

Director of client service at Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) Wendy Wolfman, who has had a relationship with Youthdale staff since 1996, said she was thrilled to learn that she could refer her clients to the camp.

"Because we already have this connection between Youthdale and [JF&CS's] Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre, it just made sense that Youthdale would call us and say, 'What if we opened up our camp program to JF&CS kids?'"

Wolfman explained that JF&CS used to operate its own residential home but after suffering huge budget cuts in 1996, JF&CS was forced to close its doors.

"We asked [Youthdale] to open a Jewish, kosher treatment home. To this day, they continue to run that home," she said, adding that while the children live at Youthdale's Jewish Cultural Residence, they spend their days at the Diamond centre for treatment and education.

Wolfman said that Youthdale centres and the camp – which also provides kosher meals – is a "terrific" resource for the Jewish community and for children in general.

"This really is a camp that can support kids who have some behavioural, emotional issues, who would not be welcomed at other camps," Wolfman said.

"Most camps just can't [accommodate them] because they don't have the resources or staffing. Magnetawan does."

Community urged to be vigilant as Mideast heats up

No specific threats have been received

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is cautioning Jewish community organizations and facilities to ratchet up their security measures, given Iran's recent threats to attack Jewish and Israeli targets around the world.

CIJA is advising the Jewish community to implement pre-set protocols that govern responses to security concerns, said the organization's CEO, Shimon Fogel.

The protocols, which have been in place for several years, provide suggested measures for various security threats that in the current security environment should advance to a more heightened level, Fogel said.

Although there are no specific threats at hand, such advice is given when the international security situation heats up. Iran or its agents are suspected in recent attacks on Israeli diplomats in Tblisi, Georgia, as well as in New Delhi, Iran and Thailand.

"We know Canada is on the radar. That's the message expat Iranians tell us in our engagement with them... This is the kind of thing where we err on the side of caution," Fogel said.

In the past, the Jewish community has stepped up its security levels when the Middle East heated up – during the 2006 Lebanon war and in 2009 during military operations in Gaza – but concerns raised by Iran are qualitatively different, Fogel said.

In the wake of the heightened western campaign against Iran's acquisition of nuclear weapons, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and other leaders of the regime in Tehran have recently issued threats against Israeli and Jewish interests abroad. [RNS file photo]

"Iran is a bigger international threat" and has made explicit threats against Jews, Fogel said.

"Iran has repeated and longstanding comments that are getting more intense and with greater frequency," he added.

CIJA has sent Doron Horowitz, its director of national security infrastructure, across the country to audit security measures at various Jewish facilities. Horowitz is also consulting with Canadian communities and with local and national police forces to ensure that potential threats are addressed, Fogel said.

Horowitz's job is to advise communities on steps they can take to ensure their facilities are adequately protected. In recent years, Jewish schools and agencies have seen the addition of surveillance cameras, security guards and other less obvious measures.

"There is a protocol in place on paper with a set of procedures and steps for communities and institutions about how to increase the integrity of buildings and how to manage people," Fogel said.

That means incoming packages are given greater inspection and care is taken in scrutinizing guests allowed into buildings, he added.

CIJA suspected that Iran might pose a threat, and Horowitz, even before tensions escalated recently, had led community exercises "where we calibrated the need for the plan... but not in a way that heightened the level of anxiety within the community or would impact in a way that wasn't constructive or helpful," Fogel said.

So far, the measures are purely precautionary. The situation hasn't reached the point where the community might be advised to avoid synagogues or keep their children out of school, he added.

Poison's antidote

Every year around this time as temperatures inch higher, blue skies become more frequent and breezes blow moderately warmer, we are reminded of the imminent advent of spring. But every year around this time, some breezes blow toxically, disbursing tiny droplets of poison into the fermenting soil of students' curiosity, self-discovery and growth on college campuses around North America.

Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) returns.

This year marks the eighth annual campus "celebration" of falsehood and calumny against the Jewish state. The celebrants, as we know, care very little about fact and rather a great deal more about ideology. In a recent column in The CJN (Feb. 5), Gil Troy compared them to the very worst distorters of truth during the Cold War. "Anyone who perpetuates the big lie accusing Israel of practising apartheid or claiming that Zionism is racism is simply passing on Soviet propaganda that has outlived its maker," he wrote.

The University of Regina Students' Union apparently couldn't wait for IAW to begin. At the instigation of the Students Against Israeli Apartheid, the union recently passed a resolution that purports to compel the university to boycott, divest from and impose sanctions (BDS) against Israel. The BDS movement, of course, is IAW's pernicious partner. Like the proponents of the Israel apartheid lie, the champions of BDS resist examining facts. They shun history and truth like slugs under a rock shun the sun.

Emile Scheffel, vice-president of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students described the movement well when he told The CJN (see the story in this issue) that the BDS campaign is anti-dialogue, anti-peace, and singles out Israel for condemnation.

BDS is the flip side of the counterfeit coin that is IAW.

To expose the bogus currency, we once again take our cue from Troy. "We need to learn our history. We need to learn the facts. We need to fight the apartheid libel with the truth. And we need to challenge Palestinians to devote a week celebrating their own nationalism rather than focusing on destroying Israel and denigrating Zionism."

Thus, this week and next on campuses throughout North America, countless students – organized by Hillel and other campus organizations and individually – will be doing precisely what Troy urges. They will defend Israel.

Some will do so in a counter-campaign called Israel Peace Week (IPW). A grassroots initiative of Hasbara Fellowships, now in its third year, IPW will advance one simple, straightforward, uncluttered message: Israel wants peace and has constantly demonstrated its willingness to make painful sacrifices for peace. In a hothouse ventilated by noxious fumes, in soil irrigated by droplets of poison, only twisted timber can grow. The antidote to falsehood's poison however, is the healing balm of truth.

We commend and thank all the students who, not always under easy conditions, will be ministering that balm.

The Conservative movement's flagship Jewish Theological Seminary announced that it would grant cantor diplomas to women at its 1987 commencement. The certificate had previously been reserved for men. Chancellor Ismar Schorsch said the move was a logical extension of JTS' 1983 decision to ordain female rabbis.

Rabbi Plaut made Ont. a better place

On behalf of the citizens of Ontario, the premier, the cabinet and the government, I would like to express our sincere condolences on the passing of Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut ("We were blessed he was in our midst," Feb. 16). Rabbi Plaut was held in high regard by the people of Ontario. Through his tireless work as vice-chair of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, he was well-known, especially for his sensitivity and understanding of minority issues.

When it came to human dignity, Rabbi Plaut was a fearless advocate. Having barely escaped the Nazis as a young man, he saw the brutality of hatred firsthand. He vowed "Never Again," and he delivered on that promise through his words and actions. His was a worldview in which the dignity of all humankind was paramount, no matter the colour of one's skin, their sexual orientation or the God of their faith.

Ontario is a better place today thanks to the tireless efforts of Rabbi Plaut. We are all proud of the rabbi's work and his legacy. It is also a reflection of the value Jewish Canadians have put on human rights and civil liberties. Rabbi Plaut understood this well. He will be missed. His memory and legacy of caring for people and his community will live on for generations to come. With deepest sympathy.

'A drink with the old rabbi'

For the last 21 years, I had the privilege of first serving as research assistant and then as a sort of granddaughter to Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut ("We were blessed he was in our midst," Feb. 16). When we first met, I had just turned 22 and he was turning 80. One evening after work, he and his late wife, Elizabeth, invited me for dinner at their home. Rabbi Plaut announced that he would be ordering in pizza ("No pepperoni, Miss Fingerhut") and asked what I would like to drink. "Whatever you have will be fine," I said respectfully. "You will have water," he replied. He presented me with a large glass of "water," downed his own glass in one shot, and said: "Please, Miss Fingerhut, have some water." Not one to disobey a rabbi, I followed suit and promptly choked, causing his wife to scold him: "Gunther, you could have killed her. What would you have done if she was allergic to alcohol!" Rabbi Plaut winked at me: "Someday, Natalie, you will tell everyone how you had a drink with the old rabbi," he said.

Rabbi Plaut taught me how to think critically and to write with clarity. He showed me that the world was bigger than myself. He was my go-to guy when I didn't know what to do when I grew up, and the first person I told when I met my future husband. He raised me from a self-centred bratty child to the responsible and respectful adult that I am today.

Anti-Israel speakers on campus

The real issue in the article "Wiesenthal Center objects to McMaster speaker" (Feb. 2) is identified with this statement: "[Avi] Benlolo, [CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center], who sends letters of complaint to university presidents each time he learns that an anti-Israel speaker has been invited to speak on a Canadian campus, said he is becoming tired of getting the 'brush-off.'" The fact is that by the time an anti-Israel speaker is booked, it is nearly impossible to unbook, as we've witnessed for years. Jewish organizations must unite to demand legislation to prevent universities from continuing as anti-Israel forums, and not just wait for the next fire to put out! Our current Conservative government is the most outspoken friend and defender of Israel. Jewish organizations would be wise to galvanize and take advantage of this golden opportunity. It is nearly too late.

Never again: if not now, when?

I can well understand people who dismiss comparisons between Adolf Hitler and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, 1939 Germany and 2012 Iran or the modern and well-armed state of Israel and defenceless Holocaust-era European Jewry. The differences are so vast that there's no wonder many people find them ludicrous.

I can also empathize with those who suspect that supporters of an attack on Iran are cynically conjuring images of the Holocaust in order to advance their cause. In recent years, any tin-pot dictator who threatens Israel is Hitler's successor, any critic of Israeli policies is a latter-day Goebbels and every call to negotiate on the basis of the 1967 borders is but a station on the road to the Final Solution.

When zealous haredim or ultra-nationalists call IDF soldiers Nazis and their commanders Eichmanns, when left-wing radicals describe the Israeli army as SS stormtroopers and Gaza as Dachau, when one of the most popular characters on Seinfeld is a Soup Nazi and when Hitler himself becomes the darling of YouTube spoofs from the movie Downfall, one can hardly blame people for refusing to take Holocaust analogies seriously.

But even if the legacy of the Holocaust has been crassly trivialized and cynically exploited by politicians in Israel and the Diaspora, it's still a towering presence in the lives of most Israelis and Jews individually, and of Israel and the Diaspora, collectively. It's not some distant memory. It's not a historical tragedy. It's not something that happened to our forefathers once upon a time in a strange and distant land. It's not a ruse, not a cover, not a pretext and not an excuse. Even as the last of the survivors are rapidly disappearing from our lives and even if their children and grandchildren are living secure and comfortable lives, and even if Israel has the most powerful army in the Middle East and a reported nuclear arsenal that can destroy any combination of its enemies seven times over, memories of the Holocaust are omnipresent. And 70 years after the fact, it's the main prism through which I and most other Jews view the spectre of a nuclear-armed Iran and the echo chamber where the arguments for and against a military attack are heard.

My mother, of blessed memory, never forgave her parents for refusing to leave Prague after the Nazi occupation in 1939, even though they stood a good chance of securing an exit visa. And she never forgave herself for not insisting.

It's only bluster, they told her, a political posture. He wouldn't dare. The world won't allow it. The Germans would never agree. The proud and lofty civilization of Goethe, Schiller and Beethoven cannot harbour such evil. Herr Hitler might be a ruthless and cunning and Jew-hating politician, but he's not crazy. He knows his limitations. He isn't suicidal. He wouldn't push his country over the edge. All we need do is wait and this, too, shall pass. "You go ahead," they told her, "but we will stay here. Everything will be all right."

My grandfather died of typhus in October 1943 in the Terezin concentration camp in Czechoslovakia and my grandmother was gassed to death in Auschwitz in late 1944, when the Germans had already lost the war, but were insanely insisting on using their last remaining resources to murder as many Jews as they possibly could. And when the Allies were asked to bomb the camps or the rail lines feeding them, they couldn't be bothered. They were otherwise engaged.

So after listening carefully to the logical analyses of experts about the internal rivalries between the ayatollahs, the limitations of the Iranian regime, its need to divert attention away from the deteriorating economy, the growing internal opposition, the prospects for regime change, the 3,000-year-old civilization that would never be risked, the hidden rationality of the irrational bluster, the fact that the Iranian leadership is not suicidal and would not endanger its own existence and the deterrent power of Israel's powerful army and nuclear arsenal – after all this, I still believe, as do many Jews and Israelis, that a nuclear Iran is the worst possible option and that anything and everything that can be done should be done to prevent it.

Israel's cabinet will decide the Jewish state's ultimate response to Iran. Advising the cabinet at that time will be some of the same individuals who gave advice regarding the release of Gilad Schalit from Hamas captivity: pictured to the right of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, centre, is head of Shin Bet, Yoram Cohen and to the prime minister's immediate left is the secretary of cabinet, Zvi Hauser, and to Hauser's left is David Meidan, a senior section chief at the Mossad. [Israel Sun photo]

And although I freely admit that this attitude is heavily influenced by the trauma and the legacy of the Holocaust, I reject the notion that this is irrational. In fact, the opposite is true: it's the expectation that when they come to make a decision about Iran, Israelis should ignore their experience, disregard their memories and forget the lessons that they learned from the destruction of European Jewry that is itself irrational. Jews know better than most that the unthinkable should never be dismissed, that the monstrous is often a viable option and that inside any supposedly cool and calculating antisemite there may lurk a murderous barbarian just waiting for an opportunity.

After all, what differentiated Hitler from all the others was neither his motivation nor his intention to exterminate the Jews, but the fact that he had the means and the opportunity to do so. When Iran has a bomb and a missile to carry it, it too will have the instrument of Israel's destruction at its disposal. No rational leader of modern-day Israel – which, despite the cliché, rose out of the ashes of the Holocaust – can ever allow such a thing to happen.

Other than "Israel-lasters" – that is, people who have Israel's worst interests at heart and who view American foreign policy through the narrow prism of weakening Israel as much as possible – most opponents of a military confrontation with Iran, either American or Israeli, are genuinely convinced that it would do more harm than good, would damage rather than enhance America's interests in the Middle East and would entail horrific consequences for Israel and the region as a whole. And they're convinced that Iran will never attack Israel with a nuclear weapon, because the regime, after all, is completely rational and intent on surviving.

On my side of the argument, I admit, there are some gung-ho Republican presidential candidates who sometimes seem absolutely gleeful in promoting an attack on Iran – remember John McCain's 2008 rendition of "bomb, bomb, Iran" to the tune of the Beach Boys' Barbara Ann? – as well as run-of-the-mill rabid right-wingers who disdain diplomacy, don't believe in sanctions, think that liberals and Europeans are weak-kneed appeasers, view all Muslims – including Barack Hussein Obama, of course – as collaborating with Iran against western civilization and would like nothing better than to see clouds of smoke, preferably mushroom-shaped, rising over Tehran.

But most Israelis, from both sides of the political spectrum, would rather have Iran cave in to sanctions or be defeated in the clandestine war that is being waged against it. They are perplexed by the opposition of some Israeli security chiefs to an attack and absolutely terrified of its aftermath and its fallout and the danger that these may prove no less destructive than if Iran had built the bomb.

Nonetheless, when push comes to shove, when all the other options have been exhausted, when there is no other avenue left, when it's yes or no, do or die, kill or be killed – then I think that most Israelis and Jews, including myself, will support a military attack. And the only way to prevent such a risky and dangerous development is to stop the Iranian nuclear problem dead in its tracks, and to stop it now.

Otherwise, in all likelihood, with grave doubts and terrible misgivings, the planes will be dispatched, the missiles will be launched, the troops will be landed and the bombs will then explode. Because the phrase "Never again," however grossly misused and cynically manipulated throughout the years, was actually meant for this very moment.

Contemplating age-old questions about aging

The poignant plea "Cast me not away in the time of old age" acquires its most powerful meaning when one looks around and realizes that this time is fast approaching for many.

Much is being written about how Canada funds its old age public pension system and attendant medical costs. As someone collecting CPP and OAS, I realize that by being born just five years ahead of the baby boomers, I've been able to live large on the government's amazingly generous system of pensions and medical care.

That's a joke, folks. If I had to survive in Vancouver on CPP and OAS, I would be eating cat food before the end of the month. Food bank, Sally Ann, here I come.

What's the real problem here?

The media and government officials assume that we seniors partied our lives away before retirement, doing little to advance the good of the community. In retirement, we spend our time on the golf course or slurping drinks in Maui. Meanwhile, poor, hard-working stiffs are taxed to death while we laze around the pool. For them it's all about the money. Is it? Should it be?

A recent episode of the series Arctic Air revolved around the intention of a First Nations elder to return home alone to his camp rather than join his son in Yellowknife, where he would be sent to an old age home. Ultimately, rather than being "locked up in four walls," he convinces the hero that he has the right to make his own decision. He is last seen heading north.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

The script gave each character a chance to articulate an argument for or against the elder's decision. "It's his to make." "But what if he dies out there, cold, alone?" "Shouldn't we do what is best for his wellbeing?" And, most terrible, "He's losing it."

True, we seniors do think about what will happen if we end up unable to look after ourselves, or age out of whatever resources we have, or become a danger to ourselves or those around us. What if our spouses are themselves are too old and frail to look after us? What if our children won't derail their lives to look after us? Then what?

My childhood household included, at various times, both my widowed grandmothers. One was spry and had a wry sense of humour. The other, after a series of strokes, needed constant care. Both my parents worked. In any case, who had money to pay for a "home"? And, indeed, no one expected us to make that choice. So we looked after them until they passed away. From them I learned a great deal.

A First Nations woman wrote to me some time ago. "I'm already considered an elder!" she noted with surprise. Of course, I thought. You were wise even when you were young. Now, as an elder, you will be able to speak from that wisdom and be heard, in communities where wisdom is so needed.

Al tashlicheni b'et ziknah! Don't throw me away when I am old. Since those words were written thousands of years ago, the problem seems as old as time. What would I wish? What do I expect from my spouse, my children, the government, the medical system? What do I expect from my community? Yes, it's about the wisdom, if any, that elders may pass on. More importantly, is anyone listening?

Are we thinking about the right questions? Or is it easier to just think about the cost, without acknowledging that we don't even have the right questions? Right now, the feeling seems to be, "Get out of the way and let us make the decisions. We can't afford you."

A primary rule of social planning: know what your real goal is. Then you can make it happen. If you want to save money, you will create that system. If you value the person and their experience, you will create a system that cherishes and values those gifts.

What I do believe – most strongly – is that a better question to start with is how we will understand and appreciate the wisdom and strength of our elders, what society can learn from them, and what will make the best society for both old and young.

Come to think of it, that goes for any age.

Finally someone said, 'Enough already'

The other day a student called to interview me about Women of the Wall. It's been many years since I was an active member of that group, and his questions evoked many memories and concerns.

I remember that first prayer service at the Kotel. We were at a conference on women and Jewish law. We were active prayer members – some of us had even started our own women's prayer groups. After years of studying the law together, we were experienced with rabbinic law and reactions, or so we thought. Going together to the Western Wall, we bridged many different needs and denominational concerns. We spent an exhilarating evening deciding how to conduct ourselves.

In general, many of us often wondered why the male establishment was so opposed to our gentle, separate form of prayer. Why did they assume we were rebellious when we thought we were trying to increase our ritual participation by following the law? How could we be so misunderstood?

Residents of Beit Shemesh protest the growing demand by radical religious elements to exclude women from public life in their city and in Israel, in general. The sign reads: "Shemesh is a Zionist city." [Flash90 photo]

Years later, we have a better understanding of the presumptions and miscalculations, but questions remain pertaining to process and long-range goals. For example, how is it possible that the Supreme Court of Israel would rule that while the women didn't violate any Jewish law, they disturbed public order? It was the individuals in the men's section who threw chairs who would seem to have violated public order. Why blame the women?

And how is it that Israel's feminist community did not come to the defence of this small, beleaguered group of women? Today, the Women of the Wall still pray together on Rosh Chodesh, but they are limited by certain forms and structures. Yet they have a vibrant committed element that will not be denied their spiritual heritage. After centuries of being denied access to Jewish holy sites, it's ironic that in the name of Jewish religion, Israeli authorities deny women access to our holy sites.

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

As the interviewer asked me more questions about my own commitments and priorities, I began to make certain connections. The Kotel was not my primary issue. I did spend many hours on it at certain points in time, but I didn't think it was the sink-or-swim issue for Jewish feminism by any means. Yet it touched the hearts of many people, as we understood that we should not let others dictate our access to our heritage – neither in terms of Jewish texts, architecture nor communal institutions.

Few outside of our group understood it in those terms or saw the full impact of its potential. But perhaps today I might hazard a connection – to Beit Shemesh and a lovely eight-year-old who was rudely treated by zealots who think they own the religious character of Israel. Now I know that there's no direct link or even any association that we can legitimately make. I am not trying to make the Women of the Wall into a more important cause than it was.

For too long we allowed a certain element to take over, to control our image of "the religious." It was too difficult to stop them at every juncture. There were just too many issues and they were too adamant and it took too much energy. Israelis were too busy fighting wars and earning a living. This fanatical group was so obsessive about whatever small issue was at stake (and they were not out earning a living or fighting in wars) that it just seemed simpler to let them have it. Separate buses, sidewalks, no army service, government support for anti-Zionist schools, no women on signs, and no women at the Kotel with a Torah or singing or anything. Just give in. Let their rabbis be in charge of marriage and divorce, and let them control conversion.

And before you know it, they own the religious character – and actually the entire character – of Israel. We gave it up to them by not fighting each and every little battle.

The Women of the Wall was not settled in court. The Supreme Court asked the state to satisfy each group. But fearing the religious zealots, the state denied the religious freedom of the women. No one said a word. How far was that from Beit Shemesh – from some men thinking they could yell at an eight-year-old and force her to conform to their standard of dress.

Thank God someone said, "Enough already." Pity it took so long.

Iran's nuclear program reignites tension

Leon Panetta, the U.S. secretary of defence, told the Washington Post recently he believes there is a strong possibility that Israel will pre-emptively strike Iran's nuclear facilities in April, May or June, before Iran enters what Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak has ominously described as a "zone of immunity."

Barak claims that if Israel waits much longer, Iran's far-flung network of nuclear plants, buried deep underground, will be invulnerable to attack. "Later is too late," he is reported to have said.

Panetta's comment has intensified a tense and heated debate in Israel and the United States whether brute military force to stop Iran in its tracks would be wise or effective.

It has also prompted sharp reactions from the increasingly isolated but defiant Iranian regime. Last week, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad boasted of Iran's "very major nuclear achievements" and declared that Iran "will not withdraw one inch" from its "[nuclear] rights." Two weeks ago, Hossein Salami, the deputy leader of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, vowed to retaliate against any country that violates Iran's sovereignty.

The latest round in this war of words and brinkmanship erupted last November when the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency published a report saying that Iran has "carried out activities relevant to the development of a nuclear device."

But in a dissenting view, the U.S.-based Institute for Science and International Security says that Iran is unlikely "to dash toward making nuclear weapons as long as its uranium enrichment capability remains as limited as it is today." It adds that Iran will not go nuclear until it is able to augment enrichment to the point "where it would have the ability to make weapon-grade uranium quickly and secretly."

Iran, which has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction, claims its nuclear program is peaceful in nature, intended to generate electricity and manufacture medical isotopes. Israel is highly skeptical, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu having said that Iran has already decided to become a nuclear power.

The official American view, as enunciated by James Clapper, the director of U.S. national intelligence, is that Iran's leaders have yet to decide whether to build a nuclear weapon, even as they continue to enrich their stockpile of uranium. According to Panetta, Iran would need about a year to build an A-bomb, once a decision is taken to do so.

Israel and the United States,

though unanimously opposed to an Iranian nuclear arsenal, are in disagreement over a major issue. Washington, preferring a diplomatic rather than a military solution, wants to give current sanctions imposed on Iran sufficient time to work. Israel remains doubtful that sanctions will convince Iran to abrogate its militarized nuclear program.

Iran, so far, has been subjected to four rounds of United Nations sanctions. These measures have dented its economy, but have not dimmed its appetite for attaining nuclear status.

Indeed, sanctions may have had the opposite effect, inducing Iran to redouble its effort to join Israel in the exclusive nuclear club.

Iran is also being squeezed by American sanctions, which are aimed at its vital oil-export sector. Similar European Union sanctions are due to kick in on July 1.

Iran, in response, has threatened to close the Strait of Hormuz, through which much of Arab and Iranian oil is shipped to markets, and end oil exports to Europe before July. Still more defiantly, Iran's oil minister, Rostam Qasemi, has said that Iran will not retreat from its nuclear program, even if its crude oil exports grind to a halt.

Netanyahu has called the U.S. and EU sanctions a "step in the right direction," but not crippling enough to deter Tehran from halting its nuclear program.

At a recent meeting in New York, Israel's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, warned 15 ambassadors accredited to the United Nations that Israel is "keeping all options on the table," even as it hopes that sanctions will work.

Barak, in an earlier warning, said, "If sanctions don't achieve the desired goal of stopping [Iran's] military nuclear program, there will be a need to consider taking action." Before issuing this veiled threat, Barak indicated that Israel has not made a decision to deploy force. "The entire thing is very far off," he noted.

Israel's strategic affairs minister, Moshe Ya'alon, a former chief of staff, has called for a combination of international pressure, biting sanctions, support for Iranian figures opposed to the Islamic fundamentalist regime and a "credible military option."

Israel has reportedly used covert means to try to disable Iran's nuclear program, having allegedly assassinated five Iranian nuclear scientists in the past five years, having purportedly killed the head of its long-range missile program and having engaged in cyber warfare to blow up its centrifuges. But Israel has stepped back from the brink and not resorted to an aerial bombing campaign to deal with Iran.

Ehud Barak

Israeli leaders who support an aggressive approach, including Netanyahu and Barak, apparently believe that an attack is not as risky as some contend and that Iran's nuclear program can be set back by several years. By all accounts, they reject the widespread assumption that an Israeli raid would touch off a catastrophic regional war, cause the deaths of thousands of Israelis and result in unprecedented property damage and skyrocketing global oil prices.

Dissenters, such as the former director of the Mossad, Meir Dagan, reject these arguments as intrinsically self-serving and dangerous and argue that a nuclear-armed Iran does not pose an existential threat to Israel.

Israeli proponents of attacking Iran have fed journalists information suggesting that a strike will occur this year. In a New York Times Magazine piece, Ronen Bergman writes that Israeli leaders feel that conditions are supposedly ripe for an assault: sanctions and containment strategies have been exhausted. Israel has the ability to inflict severe damage to Iran's nuclear sites. Israel can withstand Iranian reprisals. Israel would have the tacit support of the international community.

U.S. President Barack Obama, an opponent of an attack, has been quoted as saying that Israel is still mulling the matter. In the meantime, the Obama administration has expressed anxiety that Israel may go for broke and bomb Iran. Perhaps Netanyahu has reached the conclusion that the United States cannot do the job for Israel. The Wall Street Journal has reported that the United States does not possess deep-penetration bombs powerful to destroy Iran's nuclear facilities.

So the question now is whether Israel is using the threat of an attack on Iran to increase pressure on Tehran, or whether Israel is serious about using force.

It's debatable. In bombing nuclear reactors in Iraq and Syria in 1981 and 2007 respectively, Israel struck without notice. But will Israel bomb Iran now that the element of surprise has been removed?

The current director of the Mossad, Tamir Pardo, visited Washington earlier this month to gauge U.S. reaction to an Israeli strike. He was probably informed that while the United States is determined to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear arsenal, it is equally determined to restrain Israel, at least for now.

Another steady and happy year for my family.

I invested with Romspen on the advice of a friend 18 years ago. Throughout I have consistently added to my Romspen account. At one point I took some investment dollars out to put into mutual funds, but I was sorry. It didn't compare to the consistent returns and peace of mind that the Romspen fund gives me. Everyone in my family is a Romspen investor. We like the personal service we get any time we call. I feel fortunate that we are physically, spiritually and financially healthy.

Centre for Jewish Education appoints new director

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Ed Segalowitz, formerly UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's chief of corporate affairs, has been appointed executive director of the federation's Centre for Jewish Education, effective last month.

Chari Schwartz, who served as acting executive director of the centre, is now its associate director. Schwartz, who has a 28-year history as an educator, and Segalowitz, whose background is not in education, constitute the senior "team" of a staff of five.

Ed Segalowitz

In 2009, the centre's predecessor, the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz) was downsized and restructured, eliminating 10 of 14 full-time jobs. As well, its budget was cut from $13.8 million to $12.6 million, while tuition subsidies were increased by $500,000. Its 2011/2012 budget is $12.3 million.

At the time, the federation announced its intent to enhance the capacity of community day schools to provide "direct education services, rather than receiving services supplied by the Mercaz.

Segalowitz' appointment represents the implementation of the entity's new role, Sokolsky told The CJN last week. "Nothing has changed significantly since [the restructuring.]

He added that federation lay leaders chose Segalowitz, who has worked in the Jewish community for more than 25 years, for his expertise in organizational strategy, development and capacity building.

Sokolsky said that other institutions are undergoing similar changes, with leaders "relying on their team to provide the background specific to the organization."

The centre works collaboratively with the schools, Sokolsky said. "Most of the schools are very resourceful and advanced in understanding curriculum and educational requirements of students. In terms of capacity building, they're looking for support and advice in areas of cost savings, marketing, fundraising and strategic planning."

Segalowitz said the mandate of the centre is "to help the education sector develop its capacity, both in day schools as well as supplementary."

Before the Mercaz was downsized, it ran programs including professional development days, and the Midrasha L'Morim (Jewish teachers' seminary), which is no longer in operation. "It was put on hold and I don't think it's starting up," Segalowitz said.

Two years ago, instead of organizing its annual professional development (PD) day, the centre provided grants to schools for professional development. It is still organizing Rikudya, the annual dance festival for students, and Zimriya, an annual song festival.

In 2010, Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, wrote a report detailing more than 60 recommendations for the new entity.

"That was a discussion document," Segalowitz said, adding that it was followed up by a second document.

He said in a phone interview that he couldn't comment on whether any recommendations were being implemented. He is still getting oriented, he noted.

The centre has just launched an initiative to enhance supplementary education and expand the number of options available for families who "do not now engage in supplementary education and might consider it as an option," Segalowitz said. The initiative is part of JESNA's (Jewish Education Service of North America's) WOW! Project, which will also run in other cities in North America.

Half the Jewish children ages 4 to 17 in the Toronto area are either in day school or supplementary schools, Segalowitz said. "We're looking at how to sustain what we have and how to attract the others as well."

As well, he added, "we're meeting with the day schools to deal with other issues that are under discussion at the moment."

Among those issues is the high cost of tuition. "Over the next 12 to 18 months, we're looking to build a plan."

Sokolsky said the federation's commitment to Jewish education is "stronger than ever."

He said an increased emphasis on informal and supplementary Jewish education does not mean a decreased emphasis on day school education. "The Toronto federation puts in more money in Jewish education than all the 10 largest federations after us do in total. I don't think it's a zero sum game."

He added that despite high day school tuition fees, the rate of day school attendance has not changed in recent years relative to the size of the school-age Jewish population.

Correction

In the article "UJA campaign ahead of last year's pace" (CJN, Feb. 16) Felicia Posluns' title was stated incorrectly. She was chair of women's philanthropy for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2012 campaign. Lori Sheff is incoming chair of women's philanthropy for 2013.

Teacher brings art appreciation to preschoolers

Diana Bick's students at Hillcrest Progressive School are unusually conversant with the work of artists such as Paul Klee, Marc Chagall and Vincent Van Gogh, given that they are only four and five years old.

Recently, Bick led a senior kindergarten class in a discussion about Andy Warhol, reviewing what the children had learned in a previous class. "What kind of things did he paint?" she asked.

"Soup cans!" piped up one youngster.

"Do you remember why he painted soup cans?" Bick prompted. "He was sick, and what did his mummy feed him?"

The discussion circle – which included concepts like intensity of colour, complementary and contrasting colours, and what constitutes art – preceded work on a Warhol-like art project.

Each student had a paper divided into four squares, and painted traced images of their hand in each of the four squares. Bick also read the class a story by Warhol's nephew, James Warhola, titled Uncle Andy's.

By Frances Kraft

An award-winning artist who teaches a junior kindergarten class in the mornings and art in the afternoon, Bick likes to use a Smart Board as part of her lessons. She often shows the children art images and videos about artists.

Bick has been at the 83-year-old Jewish preschool school since 1986, when she was an early childhood education student at Humber College.

A mother of three children, now 22, 20 and 18, Bick worked part-time during their growing-up years.

As a teenager at Vincent Massey Collegiate Institute in Etobicoke, she wondered whether to pursue art or early childhood education, opting for the latter with the intention of pursuing her art studies later.

"I loved art class in school," she said. "For my birthdays I'd get art kits and pencil kits. I was always drawing."

She traces her interest in art back to her childhood, when her father would draw funny cartoons of family events – of her not eating her eggs, for example – and leave them for her to find.

Art has been "sort of a second career I've been fostering for years," Bick said. A member of the Bayview Watercolour Society and Toronto Watercolour Society, Bick studied for several summers at the Haliburton School of the Arts. She also studied art, history and literature at York University and has taken private art instruction.

Bick initially instituted art education in her own classroom and was asked to bring the program to other classes in the school. She has also done pottery with her students.

As well, she makes a point of incorporating art activities into holiday and special occasion activities.

"I really believe strongly in incorporating art and learning through art," she said. Benefits include improvement in fine motor skills, focus, and colour recognition, she added.

Her work at the school "really combines my two passions."

For Bick, the process of creating art is the most important part of the lesson. "You're supposed to be in that creative zone. There's no right and wrong... I want it to be a successful, happy and rewarding experience."

A lesson from the teacher: "Children are never too young to start learning about art and its history... I believe that children are naturally creative."

ICRF's Next Generation learn from the experts

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Some 300 young professionals got first-hand advice from successful entrepreneurs and, at the same time, raised $63,000 for the Israel Cancer Research Fund at the ICRF Next Generation's 2nd annual Revolving Tables, held at Toronto's Park Hyatt Hotel Feb. 9.

"We are both young professionals," said Leah Carr, who co-chaired the Revolving Tables event with Kyle Lichtman, "and we know that while many young professionals have career questions, few have access to senior executives whom they can ask for candid answers on career paths and career opportunities. Many young professionals are also unsure of a specific career direction to pursue, so the ability to meet several senior executives in an intimate setting would make the experience even more valuable. Hence, the concept of Revolving Tables was born."

Next Generation committee co-chairs Jodi Fenwick and David Elfan said ICRF strives to foster generosity, community involvement and shared experiences, with the goal of raising $35,000 annually, the cost of a grant for one scientist to do one year of research in Israel, research that could assist in eradicating cancer.

The evening was structured around a three-course meal. Participants were assigned to a table where they networked with other participants. Each table was hosted by a Toronto business executive who shared his or her journey to success, offered advice and answered questions. After each course, the participants switched tables to meet their next mentor.

Thirty-two CEOs in a variety of fields were invited to act as moderators and mentors. Among them were interior designer Brian Gluckstein, author and culinary expert Rose Reisman, Harvey Kalles Real Estate president Michael Kalles, Mandell Entertainment Group CEO Corey Mandell, Cineplex Inc. president and CEO Ellis Jacob, Goodmans LLP co-chair Dale Lastman, Herzig Eye Institute medical director Dr. Sheldon Herzig and Post Media Network Inc. president and CEO Paul Godfrey.

The evening's host, Julian Brass, founder of Notable.ca, an online lifestyle guide for young professionals across Canada, shared one of his secrets to success. "Passion, it was my passion to manifest my online business. It is passion for life that makes cancer patients fight back, and God willing, survive. It is passion and dedication that [makes] doctors who are aiming to find a cure wake up every single day and not take no for an answer."

Jordan Banks, managing director of Facebook Canada shared the qualities he feels a business leader must have today. "One needs three fundamental qualities: number 1, a real sense of curiosity. The world changes so quickly, technology evolves so rapidly that you need to be curious and you need to have a real passion for not only what today brings but tomorrow as well… Secondly, you need to be extremely community-minded. We live in an era where it's all about community, and you need to be genuine and you need to be authentic, and you need to be who you say you are and have a very strong moral compass. When you do that in business and as a business leader… people are going to want to buy your product and service and people are going to want to work with you. The third factor you need is to be motivational, inspirational and honest as a business leader."

Canadian Football League commissioner Mark Cohon added another element. "I think you have to love what you do, and if you don't love what you do, change it," he said.

Participant Allan Beckerman, founder and CEO of IQ Inc., which provides project management and software development services to companies with information technology needs, looked at the question a little differently. "Pursue what you are passionate about, certainly passion plays a big part of the equation, but I think people must gravitate toward things they are actually good at, and that has been evidenced to me by some of the CEOs here tonight," he said.

Charity prepares for dragon boat race

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Canadian supporters of the One Family Fund have always looked for new and offbeat ways to visit Israel.

Not for them mundane bus tours and de rigeur tourist stops. Instead, during previous visits, they've taken their supporters on five-day bike rides, rappelled down rock faces, scrambled on steep mountain grades and chosen events more suited for mountain goats than matronly philanthropists.

This time, it's no different. In May, supporters of the One Family Fund will man two uniquely decorated vessels in the Dragon Boat Israel Festival.

Forty-four people will paddle for the Fund in two days of races, which takes place on the Sea of Galilee on May 17 and 18.

They will be among an expected 40 teams of paddlers, split between North Americans and Israelis, including members of families that have lost loved ones to terror attacks.

As many as 1,000 people are expected at the event, the first of its kind in Israel, said Debbie Halton-Weiss, Canadian chair of Dragon Boats for Israel.

The festival will introduce the sport of dragon boat racing to the Jewish state, raise money for charities and create a fun way to bond with Israelis, she said.

Among the 20 North American crews, most of them Canadians, will be breast-cancer survivors, One Family Fund supporters and individuals enthused by the sport, Halton-Weiss said.

Pam Albert, executive director of One Family Fund Canada, said terror victims, bereaved parents and Israeli supporters of the charity would join Canadian paddlers in their boats.

The event will afford bereaved Israelis the opportunity to enjoy a get-away, recharge their emotional batteries, work with others as a team and perhaps learn new coping strategies.

As for the Canadians, "it's a really hands-on opportunity to be with the victims of terror and get the opportunity to connect," she said.

When they're not racing their dragon boats, the Canadians will also do volunteer work, visit bereaved families, take part in a one-day hike and devote another day to touring.

The dragon boat race is one of three main athletic activities the charity has scheduled in Israel, Albert continued. From Oct. 21 to 25, supporters can take part in an annual hike, while in March supporters take to the streets of Jerusalem for that city's marathon.

Each of the events is also a fundraising opportunity. The charity raised $1.2 million last year, with funds earmarked for camps designed for victims of terror, youth clubs, twinning of bar and bat mitzvah kids and retreats for bereaved Israeli families, she said.

For the One Family Fund, combining a good cause with the dragon boat extravaganza "is an alternative, fun way to see Israel, to really connect with the land and people… I think people are really looking for a new way to connect to Israel," Albert said.

One Family Fund was recruited to the dragon boat races through contacts in the United Israel Appeal of Canada, a sponsor of the event.

Halton-Weiss, who also chairs the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, took up the sport several years ago and immediately appreciated the way it brought together sports, support for charity and community building. She spearheaded the effort to bring the event to Israel.

Dragon boat racing originated in China 2,000 years ago and has grown in popularity in Canada over the last 25 years. It features long boats decorated with a dragon head. A drummer pounds out a beat as 20 paddlers move the boat while a 22nd individual steers the boat at the rear.

Brady has received thousands of letters from students

Winner of the Silver Birch Award, voted by Ontario students, the story spawned a television documentary by veteran CBC journalist Joe Schlesinger, a film, a website and, in Japan, a touring group of student actors called Small Wings.

Brady still can't believe the story could touch so many lives and even today is at a loss to explain why.

"I didn't think it would be interesting for anybody but the family," he said. "I had no idea how far it would go. Nobody could imagine how far it would go."

His wife, Teresa, has her own take on why the story became so popular. The book is constructed in a way that touches young people today, she said.

Part of it focuses on the Brady family's normal life in Czechoslovakia – the skiing and theatre outings – and contrasts it with the world of fear created by the Nazis.

"It describes this happy family life before the hell happened," she said. "They go through a period of evil and still stay [human.]"

"Everyone seems to be able to find a connection in the story to themselves," adds Brady's daughter, Lara.

New immigrants from strife-riven countries like Somalia have been touched by it and they see "a certain parallel," he said.

He's seen that same universal appeal across Canada and during his many speaking engagements abroad. In Macao, 2,500 kids came to hear him tell the story. Afterward, a young girl came up to him and told him how she was affected by the tragic death of her grandfather.

Hearing her story, "I told her to make it through the mourning and then life goes on. She acknowledged she could also get through it," Brady said.

One of the incidents that touched him the most was described in a letter from a teacher in a Micmac community in Nova Scotia. It told of a young girl who, it was feared, might take her own life.

"The teacher wrote that the girl read the book and now it changed her attitude completely. Things like that…" Brady said, his voice trailing off.

Over the years, Brady has received thousands of letters from middle school students, passed along by their teachers. He's sent back 7,000 signed photos of himself and Hana in the last five years alone.

"We get about 100 e-mails a week, plus 2,000 letters a year," said Lara, who along with her father responds to them all. Another 25 to 60 questions about his life are generated on their Facebook page and "we're starting to tweet," she said.

Brady has travelled across Canada to tell the story, as well as to Hong Kong, Macao, South Africa, Israel, Australia, the Czech Republic and, just recently, Scotland. Still active at 84, he'll tell his story in Boston, Mass., in March and a month later, in New York. At one point, he'd speak to 100 schools a year, but with age he's cut it down to a more manageable 10 or 15.

Brady has used Hana's Suitcase to draw attention to another wartime story, that of his wartime friends, the boys who shared a room with him in Theresienstadt. One of them, Petr Ginz, was a creative soul who drew a picture that imagined the Earth as seen from the moon. The artwork survived the war and was taken aboard NASA's space shuttle Columbia by Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon. The shuttle, of course, burned up on re-entry, killing all on board. Ramon, it turned out, died on Ginz's birthday.

Brady marvels at the coincidences – and there are many. In 2004, he received an e-mail on his birthday from the Czech Republic. Someone, it turned out, had found his wartime diary in a dumpster. A family in Brno, in the Czech Republic, was clearing out its basement and a person walking by happened to notice some children's books on top. As his mother was a professor of drama and children's literature, he thought she might be interested in them. When he looked more closely, he also found worn books, papers and postcards. He retrieved them and turned them over to his mother. Later, she happened to read a review of Hana's Suitcase and thought the material might be connected to it. It turned out many of the items had actually belonged to Hana.

The papers were taken to a Roman Catholic priest – who happened to know Brady – and he passed them along. Among the documents were postcards from Hana, including one sent to her mother in Auschwitz but which had been returned. There was also a 90-year-old family photograph in which Brady recognized his grandparents and mother, Marketa, as a young woman.

Also retrieved was Brady's diary from Theresienstadt, with the last entry in September 1944, just five days before he was transported to Auschwitz. The material had been found at the home that belonged to Brady's aunt's family. It had been saved because the aunt's husband was not Jewish and was not deported.

Just another coincidence in a remarkable series of coincidences, though Brady is convinced something more than blind luck is at play.

"The story should have ended when [the suitcase] was in Auschwitz, when it was destroyed [by vandals] in 1984. The suitcase was not an original artifact when Fumiko got it," Brady said.

Fumiko found a survivor in the Czech Republic who knew Brady and initiated contact, but the story could have ended there.

"These are crazy chances," Brady said.

Russia and China use Syria to flout the West

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last November, as Syrian leader Bashar Assad pushed ahead with his brutal assault on his own citizens who were protesting for freedom, this column asked why the media had almost entirely failed to critically examine Russia and China for their obstructionist role in opposing sanctions on Syria and refusing to condemn the Assad regime at the UN Security Council.

This recently changed. Following the Russian and Chinese veto earlier this month of a Security Council resolution backing an Arab League plan to resolve the crisis, the media finally came around to focusing on these two major powers. Indeed, for some journalists there was a sense of urgency to understand Russia's role in particular. After all, Russia is Syria's principal arms supplier and Assad used the veto as a cover to intensify his attacks, mainly on the city of Homs, where hundreds of civilians were reportedly killed as a result of tank, artillery and sniper fire.

How, some naively asked, could Russia, in full view of the Arab world, be so callous and indifferent to the human suffering they've contributed to by re-supplying Assad with heavy weapons while claiming, with stunning hypocrisy, to be opposed to favouring one side or the other.

But what of Russia's broader strategic interests in the Middle East?

In "Why Russia Supports Assad" (New York Times, Feb. 10), Dmitri Trenin, director of the Carnegie Moscow Center, pointed out that "Russia's stance on Syria is often explained in terms of Syria's importance to Moscow." However, while "Moscow's links to the Assad family go back four decades," Trenin claimed that Damascus is not ultimately a strategic ally or even a vital arms purchaser.

What explains Moscow's unstinting support for Syria, Trenin argued, is its opposition to the West, which involves primarily staking out a position against the United States and Europe for their support of the popular uprisings in the "Arab Spring." Both Russia and China, which have restive factions back home, are sending signals that by supporting Assad, they will not tolerate social upheavals, let alone revolutions.

Trenin, however, went beyond this general attitude to focus on something even more specific (and which concerns China as much as it does Russia): "When the Kremlin... looks at the Arab Awakening, they see democratization leading directly to Islamicization." Russia, let's not forget, faces the continuing prospect of a renewed insurgency from the Chechens, who are Muslim and who yearn for their independence, despite Russia's repeated brutal repressions.

With respect to China in particular, Steve Tsang, director of the China Policy Institute, observed ("China's Syrian Folly" Project Syndicate, Feb. 8) that while China has no immediate strategic investment in Syria, it sees an opening against the West that can be exploited.

As Tsang put it, "[Given] the costs of the West's misadventures in Iraq and Afghanistan (and, to a lesser extent, in Libya) compounded by its major economies' weakness, China's leaders appear to see an opportunity to push back.

"With Russia on its side, the Chinese government can take a stand without appearing isolated. And, while a long-term strategic alliance between Russia and China may not be in the offing, tactical cooperation to stop the West from imposing its values on the global community is likely to persist."

Reflecting on China's bitter resentment of what it sees as America's democracy promotion mission, Richard Bernstein, a former Beijing bureau chief for Time magazine, noted (in the Feb. 23 New York Review of Books) that "China has been the main protector of regimes now under sanctions by the United States and the West, whether Iran, Sudan, or Zimbabwe, even as it has courted foreign leaders who have been branded as pariahs. At the end of this past June, it accorded a warm welcome to Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir, even though Bashir has been indicted for crimes against humanity by the International Criminal Court, which wants him arrested."

International affairs in the "big leagues" doesn't get much uglier than this, when the butchery in Syria is but a side-show.

Western and Israel rebrand themselves

The University of Western Ontario last month undertook its third rebranding initiative since its inception as an institution.

The university was founded in 1878 as an academic branch of the Church of England, initially named the Western University of London Ontario. Early in the 20th century, the university secularized, and in 1923, was renamed the University of Western Ontario.

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

Fast forward to the present day. In January, it was rebranded as Western University Canada, "for communication, marketing and web purposes," the university says on its website. I now enjoy occasionally referring to as WU (pronounced "woo"). Its new name is a modification of its original name in an attempt to become more globalized, although its official name remains the University of Western Ontario, and it "will appear as such on diplomas and official documents."

There were two major motives behind the rebranding project.

First, Western president Amit Chamka intends to transform the university into a more progressively international institution. Since his appointment as president in 2009, the number of international students at Western has substantially increased. Chamka hopes that, as a result of the rebranding project, the international student community will continue to expand because the institution will be more easily recognized on a global scale.

Second, "establishing a more unified visual identity for Western," its communications webpage asserts, was necessary to eliminate its former identity confusion. Previously, very few people would refer to the institution by its legal name. Rather, the vast majority, in everyday discourse, would call it simply Western. Thus, it became natural to combine Western's identity with its usual street name.

Western's new rebranding reminds me of the campaign launched last year by LAPAM, the Israeli government's official advertising unit, in conjunction with Bodden Partners, a New York-based marketing communications agency, to promote Israel's tourism industry.

Focusing on this unique industry is a clever action plan that hopes to reverse prejudiced and preconceived notions of Israel and divert attention from political conflict.

Just as Western rebranded in order to attract a larger international student population, Israel has benefited from an initiative in Canada to promote increased tourism on a national scale.

For its 2011 national ad campaign, LAPAM distributed newly designed displays across Canada, particularly in Montreal and Toronto airports, in Toronto's Airport Express Bus and in some TTC bus shelters.

The displays market numerous Israeli destinations including the Sea of Galilee, the Ramon Crater, the Church of the Beatitudes, Masada, the Dead Sea and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. By exhibiting landmarks that interest Jews and non-Jews alike, Israel hopes to attract a diverse array of individuals to explore the country's fascinating antiquities.

As a result of the 2011 campaign, Israel experienced a 15 to 20 per cent increase in tourism from Canadian passport holders, making LAPAM's efforts a worthwhile initiative.

Despite the reasons behind Western's rebranding, the university received unexpected criticism following the announcement. Alumni were left bewildered, with questions about how to refer to the institution they graduated from. Current students are also having difficulty abandoning the name they are accustomed to.

I feel, however, that it's a constructive step. Today, it appears that organizations and institutions want their identities to simply and clearly reflect who they are. The advantage of a straightforward brand is that names and symbols become distinguishable and easily recognized by the public. I believe that any institution can strengthen its identity if it engages in branding strategies similar to the one Western has undertaken.

'BDS against Canadian values'

Zohar added that the BDS campaign, which was launched in 2005, goes against Canadian values.

"During previous boycott attempts, presidents of nearly every major academic institution in Canada expressed their clear opposition to academic boycotts of Israel, and it is telling that not a single major university in North America has implemented a program of boycott against Israel," Zohar said.

He said URSU should be working with the school's leadership to better represent students' interests, "rather than supporting extreme and discriminatory political campaigns."

But Peterson said the motion does represent student sentiment at his school, stressing that it was presented by a student group and not by the URSU executive or board of directors.

"I, as the president of the students' union, don't get to decide what is important. The students get to decide. So if students want to take on a social issue... that's their decision," he said. "I take my marching orders from students, not the other way around."

Now that the motion has been passed, Peterson said the next step is to look into URSU's investments.

"I think the rational action from the students' union perspective is that we sit down with our board of directors, investment professionals... and our general manager and look into our mutual funds and what we're investing in."

But Peterson admitted that he's not sure how to measure whether a company "profits from Israeli war crimes, occupation and oppression," as the motion states.

"We just have to take a very rational approach... look at our investments... and if something pops up, we'll flag it and the board of directors will decide what to do from there," Peterson said.

University of Regina spokesperson Jay Branch said the school had no comment on the motion, since it's a URSU matter.

Efforts to reach SAIA representatives for comment were unsuccessful.

Noah's Story

Fraser MacDonald with Noah

Good service and delicious home cooking are important at the Sunset Grill Family Restaurant at 11710 Yonge Street in Richmond Hill. It's breakfast time and, like a good and attentive host, 16-yr-old Noah Wolanski greets his guests at the door, guides them to a table and proudly presents a menu to each patron. He leaves the guests in the hands of the wait staff, as he surveys the restaurant to make sure the table tops are sparkling clean. He beams with excitement as he seats a party of eight. A packed Friday breakfast crowd is an opportunity for Noah to shine.

He works hard, is never late and is passionate about his responsibility in making sure all his guests are taken care of; he understands that he contributes to the success of the business.

The only difference between Noah and the rest of the crew is that he needs a little extra help in the form of his mother, Rena, who acts as his "work coach". Her support is necessary because Noah was born with myotonic dystrophy, and is physically and intellectually challenged.

Much of Noah's success is due to the efforts of his boss, Fraser MacDonald. When his father Mark posed the idea of Noah coming to work for him, MacDonald never hesitated. "If anyone was uncomfortable with him at the beginning, they certainly are not now," says MacDonald. "People see Noah; they get a chance to know him."

Two years ago, no one would have thought Noah would ever be able to hold down this volunteer position. But with the help of his family, and Fraser's compassion and patience, Noah is flourishing. His ability to cope is impressive and the pride he takes in his work is admirable; the knowledge of a job well done fills Noah with excitement.

Noah is testament to the fact that people with disabilities can work and make a contribution to society. Holding a job that allows him to interact directly with the public gives Noah a wonderful opportunity to show everyone that he is not to be feared, or pitied, but is just another person trying to get by.

Restaurant hosts don't usually get tips, but when all of Noah's guest's leave, between them, they've left him about two dollars. Noah is thrilled but understands when his boss, tells him, "It's not about the money – it's about lessons learned." That goes not just for Noah, but also for his boss and his guests too.

Noah is just one of the young people with special needs who are engaged in the newly created Community @ Work program. Joan Glick Gold has been appointed to serve as Chair of the committee which is a collaborative effort of Reena, Geneva Centre for Autism, JVS, York Region District School Board and Zareinu. The Community@Work program will strive to uphold Reena's vision of a culture that completely and successfully integrates individuals with special needs into the workplace.

A parallel Jewish universe

Rabbi Asher Vale

Worlds that function on another plane of reality are not found in science fiction only. They exist, on a more mundane level, all around us. The underground economy, for example, operates just beyond the reach of the tax collector and government regulators. There's also the realm of counterfeiters who produce fake Rolexes and ersatz Gucci purses.

The Jewish People has a parallel universe of its own. It has its own foods (kosher) and special days (Shabbat and chagim). It also has its own judicial system, which is referred to in the beginning of the section of the Torah that we read this past Shabbat: "These are the laws that you shall place before them." (Exodus, 21:1) The Talmud (Gittin, 88b) explains that the "them" referred to in this sentence are the judges of a beit din, a rabbinical court. If a Jew has an issue with another member of the tribe, the Torah mandates that he or she should go to this kind of tribunal rather than a secular court.

These courts did not operate only in biblical or talmudic times. Batei din have been organized over the past two millennia in Jewish communities throughout the Diaspora. Canada, of course, is no exception.

Batei din are convened for different purposes. The type that is likely familiar to most people is the beit din that handles gittin, Jewish divorces. If a marriage began according to the laws of Moses and Israel, it needs to end that way as well. A civil divorce doesn't cancel the religious ties that bind a couple together. It is the get that gives spiritual closure to a marriage relationship that has, unfortunately, ended.

Rabbinic Reflections

There is also a beit din that performs conversions. It is inspiring to see non-Jews who voluntarily change their whole lives even when, in some cases, they become alienated from their families and friends, in order to become part of the Jewish People. It's a reminder for those of us fortunate enough to be born into our wonderful religion, to not take it for granted.

The type of beit din referred to in the biblical verse quoted earlier is the one that resolves disputes. The primary motivation for using its services is the biblical obligation to do so. However, there are also benefits to having a claim adjudicated by a beit din. It is usually a less costly, more informal and more expeditious process than that in a secular court. It's also a way for Jews to settle their differences without washing their dirty laundry in public.

A typical beit din consists of a panel of three rabbis who are experts in Jewish law. They render their decisions by applying such law, as well as taking into account local business practices. The rulings of the beit din are almost always enforceable in local courts since batei din structure their proceedings to conform with arbitration proceedings in their local jurisdiction.

Most of the time, we can contently live in our own little worlds. However, for those exceptional situations that require them, there are batei din to assist us. Conveniently, they are not in some far-off universe, but as close as cyberspace – beis_din@hotmail.com.

Rabbi Asher Vale is the director of the beit din of the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto.

Leadership needed to sustain social programs

Otto von Bismark, the 19th-century chancellor of Germany, introduced a social insurance program that set the retirement age at a rather arbitrary 65 during a time when few people actually lived that long. Yet 65 has become sacrosanct for many people.

An entire industry has developed around retirement planning – to help some to retire early and others to work beyond 65 – and the idea of raising the age when one can fully collect CPP or old age benefits is suggested only by the politically courageous, or suicidal. Twice before, Canadian prime ministers, recognizing the economic unsustainability of such a retirement age, have been forced to back away from proposals to raise the threshold. Prime Minister Stephen Harper's recent musings about raising it are tough, but necessary.

The need for reform cannot be seriously in doubt. Whereas 30 years ago, there were six taxpaying workers for every retiree, today there are about 4.5, and in 20 short years, the ratio is projected to be 3 to 1. Surely major reforms are needed.

Judaism has always revered the aged. There is a specific mitzvah to give honour to the elderly. While modern society associates beauty with youth, the Torah thinks otherwise and associates beauty, hadar, with the face of the elderly, pnei zaken.

Yet the notion of receiving public funds just because one reaches a certain age is foreign to Judaism. Public funds are meant to be used for public needs, and giving public money to all individuals, regardless of need, is difficult to justify. Such a consideration should not apply to CPP benefits, as they are basically a forced saving plan. Part of our wages are being withheld today to be paid back to us at retirement.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Our tax system recognizes this by clawing back old age security, but not CPP benefits, beyond a certain income level. While one can debate the appropriate income level at which one should no longer be classified as needy, the clawback concept has much merit.

Additionally a Jewish pension system would likely take into consideration not only income, but also net worth. As is readily evident, there is often little correlation between a person's net worth and their income. To base government benefits (or tax rates) on income alone can lead to an unfairly distributed tax burden.

Truth be told, the entire notion of universal benefits makes little economic or moral sense. Why millionaires should receive $100 a month per child under seven while other children can't afford lunch is beyond me.

As governments face rising health care costs and continuing deficits, we'll need to choose between continuing with universal benefits by necessarily lowering the level of, or access to, health care, or directing some funding toward the most needy. By imposing user fees on the wealthy or allowing some form of a "two-tiered" health system, rich and poor alike will end up with better health care.

It's the job of leaders – political, religious and business – to do what's necessary, not what's expedient, despite the inherent job risks that this may entail.

The Peace and Violence of Judaism is even-handed

Perhaps the most pressing issue for Jews today is our attitude to the conflict surrounding the State of Israel. Even those of us who strongly support the state are divided: should the state be passionately pursuing peace or standing firm and fighting against its enemies and proudly asserting Jewish particularism and exceptionalism?

Reasonably enough, many Jews try to find guidance on this issue in our traditional texts. The problem is that Jews on the political left often argue that pursuing peace is the unequivocal message of the Jewish tradition, while Jews on the political right argue at least as forcefully that Jewish tradition teaches us to fight for exclusive Jewish national rights to the land. Which side is right?

A new scholarly book, The Peace and Violence of Judaism: From the Bible to Modern Zionism, addresses this question head on. Written by a former Torontonian, Prof. Robert Eisen, a leading scholar of Jewish studies who teaches at George Washington University in Washington, D.C., the book uses a daring and innovative method for analyzing this issue.

In the opening chapter on peace and violence in the Bible, Eisen presents not one thesis but two. First he builds the case that the Bible promotes Jewish violence against gentiles (Canaanites and Amalekites, for example) and that the original connection of the Jewish people to the land is based on an intolerant, ethnocentric worldview. Then he builds an equally impressive case for the opposite claim, that the Bible is truly universalistic, recognizing the humanity and dignity of every human being since all were created in God's image.

The chapter on rabbinic Judaism does the same thing. First he develops the thesis that the talmudic rabbis moved Judaism (even?) closer to a peaceful and universalistic model. They explicitly claimed that non-Jews, even without converting to Judaism, could perfect themselves and live meaningful lives that God would reward. They simply had to observe the seven Noahide commandments, which, it is claimed, represent the basic ethical teachings of humanity. (It is difficult to find in the Hebrew Bible an explicit description of how a gentile might live a meaningful and righteous life.)

Then he builds the case for the opposite argument, that rabbinic Judaism is intolerant, quoting derogatory rabbinic sayings about gentiles (although certainly no worse than what gentiles said about Jews back then). Even the proof from the seven Noahide commandments is debatable, Eisen explains. True, they include a number of ethical precepts that civilized people should accept (laws against murder, theft and adultery). But two Noahide laws are narrowly Jewish – one against cursing the Jewish God and one against worshipping other gods. It can be argued that the talmudic rabbis were offering gentiles a prescription for living a meaningful life only if they abandoned every gentile religion (all of which the rabbis saw as idolatrous) and practised a version of "Judaism lite."

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

Maimonides famously promoted this narrow understanding when he wrote that a gentile is considered to be righteous only if she/he observes the seven Noahide commandments specifically because God commanded them to the Jewish people. It is not sufficient, he wrote, for the gentile to say that she/he finds those laws meaningful and reasonable (Mishneh Torah, Laws of Kings 8:11).

Further chapters follow the same model, arguing that (a) the medieval Jewish philosophical tradition, (b) Kabbalah and (c) modern Zionism have traditions and arguments that promote either the case for peace or the case for violent Jewish attitudes to gentiles.

All the arguments are presented dispassionately, based on careful reading of primary sources as well as the latest academic scholarship. While the book draws heavily on scholarly books and articles that are often densely written, Eisen manages to make the issues clear even for the non-expert.

This genre is unusual. Eisen combines the best of academic style – careful footnotes and unemotional debate – with the best of talmudic style. The beginner student of Talmud is often flustered when she/he reads a long talmudic discussion that carefully lays out mutually exclusive positions on a topic and never resolves the issue. More advanced Talmud students revel in this uncertainty.

What are readers of Eisen's book to do with the uncertainty it creates? I hope they will learn to dismiss the facile arguments offered both by right-wingers and by left-wingers who cherry-pick their quotations from Jewish tradition in order to claim that they, and only they, are the legitimate heirs of traditional Jewish thinking. In addition, readers will learn a lot about Jewish history and Jewish thought, presented in an engaging manner. Perhaps some readers will be stimulated to read more of the fascinating sources that Eisen presents. The book finishes with a moving epilogue in which Eisen presents his own personal view on Middle Eastern politics (he is a moderately left-of-centre Zionist) and on Jewish-Muslim dialogue (he is an enthusiastic participant), but, of course, does not argue that his is the only acceptable reading of the tradition.

Both at the beginning of the book and at the end, Eisen challenges scholars of other religions to write dispassionate books like this about their own traditions, instead of the all-too-common triumphalist books that argue that "Religion X has always been peace-loving" or the scandalous books that argue simplistically that "Religion Y is intrinsically violent." Let us hope that responsible scholars of Christianity and Islam accept Eisen's challenge.

More than once in the book, Eisen addresses the question of whether it is appropriate to judge old Jewish texts within their original ancient world context, or whether analysis should concentrate on how those old texts affect our world today. Personally, I am drawn to the former approach. Even after reading this book, a tour de force of even-handedness, I am convinced that we Jews have much to be proud of in our tradition. It was inspiring to see how many of our writers and thinkers promoted peaceful and positive approaches to gentiles, even in periods when gentiles were saying nasty things about (and often doing nasty things to) Jews.

Jewish Toronto and World Jewry say

Spiritual leader, world-renowned scholar, F

By Daniel Horowitz

"I believe I was created as a Jew to be God's tool. I believe that my purpose on earth is to serve not only my people, but to serve humanity and do so as a Jew. Others may see only themselves and their goals, private and national. We Jews see our goals as more than private goals."

Those words were written by Rabbi Gunther Plaut, z"l, a well-respected spiritual leader, world-renowned scholar, and accomplished author who passed away on February 9, at 99 years of age, after 12th at Holy Blossom Temple, is predeceased by his wife Elizabeth, by his parents Jonas and Selma Plaut, and his brother Rabbi Walter Plaut. He is survived by his children, Judith Plaut and Rabbi Jonathan V. and Carol Plaut; his grandchildren, Daniel and Amy Plaut, and Deborah and David Elias and his great grandson, Steven Elias.

"W. Gunther Plaut, father and husband, son and grandfather, brother and uncle; eminent man of letters; a rabbi of the word and the deed, was swift like the eagle, strong like the lion. He was a prince and a great man of Israel, and now he has died," Holy Blossom's Rabbi John Moscowitz said in his eulogy. "The eagle soars above all, the lion is mighty on land. One is master of the skies, the other will never yield the ground. Each is esteemed by the Bible, one bearing the next generation on its wings, the other a symbol of pride and courage. W. Gunther Plaut was our teacher, our rabbi. He soared above us, scoping out our history as Jews. And, he stood his ground, reminding Jews of our responsibilities born of that history. Eagle and lion, Rabbi Plaut embodied grace and power, the privileges and sorrows we've known, no less, the obligations incumbent on the fortunate. Holy Blossom Temple felt that he was ours, and rightly so. But we also knew that he wasn't ours alone. From the first, Gunther Plaut was a man of the world and so he would always be."

decades of doing just that – serving humanity.

Rabbi Plaut, who came to Toronto in 1961 after serving as a rabbi in Chicago and St. Paul, was the senior scholar in residence at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple at the time of his death. He retired from his post as Holy Blossom's Senior Rabbi in 1978. Rabbi Plaut was a former Campaign Chair of United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto as well as a former President of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Rabbi Plaut, laid to rest on Sunday, February

Born in Germany, Rabbi Plaut studied at the Universities of Heidelberg and Berlin, and received the LLB Doctor of Laws in 1934. He fled from Hitler in 1935 for the United States, and the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, where he was ordained in 1939. He served as a chaplain with the United States Army during World War II, and was at the European front with the 104th Infantry. Decorated with the Bronze Star Medal, Rabbi Plaut - who, among other honours, was a Companion of the Order of Canada, and received the Order of Ontario - was the first rabbi to bring a Sefer Torah back to Germany and held the first free service in a German synagogue, in the burned-out shell of the Cologne Synagogue in 1945.

Rabbi Plaut was also present at the capture of the Dora-Nordhausen concentration camp in Germany in April, 1945.

And, according to Toronto's Mendy Sharf, a longtime friend and neighbour of Rabbi Plaut, the rabbi's devotion to Judaism knew no bounds, even during the perils of war.

"I was part of the UJA Mission that took place when 9/11 occurred," recalls Sharf. "As it happened, I was seated on the bus next to Rabbi Plaut, who was also my neighbour. He started to tell me about his work as a chaplain with the U.S. army infantry. He never carried a gun, but there he was, on the front lines with explosions all around him, and people dying left and right, but he remained untouched. Suddenly, an order was sent out telling everyone to go to the Remegen Bridge, a railway bridge across the River Rhine which gave the allies access into Germany's heartland, which the Germans were trying to destroy. It was there that a truck-load of matzohs, ordered by Rabbi Plaut, showed up amidst the chaos of war. Undaunted by the danger, Rabbi Plaut stood there, handing out a box of matzoh to every truck, tank or infantry vehicle that passed by. What an incredible scene that must have been to witness. He was truly a remarkable man."

men, women and children, standing arm-in-arm with them outside the Soviet Embassy, chanting, "Let our People go!" They were there, led by Rabbi Plaut to protest the common Soviet practice of not allowing its Jewish citizens to practice their faith, speak their language or make aliyah.

He published over two dozen books on theology, philosophy, and history, as well as works of fiction. His best known work is The Torah - A Modern Commentary, which was published by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the umbrella organization for Reform Jewish congregations in North America. This opus, which has sold nearly 120,000 copies, quickly gave Rabbi Plaut worldwide prominence.

Truly a renaissance man, Rabbi Plaut, who, in the 1950s had his own television program and for 12 years, his own weekly radio program, was an avid chess player and golfer. In fact, in 1935, he represented Germany on its tennis and soccer teams during the Maccabiah Games.

"Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut was not only the intellectual and spiritual leader of Reform Judaism, but through his communal leadership, he represented Canadian Jewry in his generation," said Elizabeth Wolfe, Board

Chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "His prolific writings, particularly his Torah Commentary, contributed to a resurgence of study and worship among liberal Jews everywhere. His success was due not only to his intellect and oratory, but to his ability to relate deeply on an individual basis as well. As a young congregant of Holy Blossom Temple, he personally inspired me, instilled me with confidence, and encouraged me to realize my potential and pursue a life of meaning and purpose."

"Rabbi Plaut's importance to Canada's Jewish community cannot be overstated," said Rabbi Adam Cutler of Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"His contributions to synagogue leadership, Jewish scholarship and public life are a model to which all rabbis should aspire. Beth Tzedec Congregation mourns shoulder to shoulder with our neighbour synagogue in the passing of this remarkable man. We are indebted to his legacy."

"Rabbi Plaut was a community leader in the truest sense," said Ted Sokolsky, President and CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "Not only was he a brilliant man, admired and respected not only in Toronto and Canada, but around the world, but he was a man who had time for anyone he came into contact with. As the Chair of United Jewish Appeal's Annual Campaign in 1970, Rabbi Plaut demonstrated not only tremendous leadership, but great vision, compassion and, of course, wisdom. I had the unique opportunity of being with him in Israel on Sept 11, 2001 when the planes hit the Twin Towers. His insights and discussions on that historical moment will remain with me forever. I extend my deepest sympathies to Rabbi Plaut's family and friends."

An Unforgettable Day. A Remarkable Man.

By Julia Koschitzky

One never forgets the exact place where one was and the moment in time when a tragedy of enormous magnitude strikes. September 11, 2001 was such a day.

I was on a bus in Israel together with Rabbi Gunther Plaut and 21 past United Jewish Appeal Campaign Chairs. We were part of a solidarity mission during the intifada and came to show our support to the people of Israel for all they had to endure during those difficult years.

Even at the ripe old age of 89 there was no way that Rabbi Plaut would miss the opportunity of participating in such an important mission. Our itinerary on September 11 took us to the northernmost part of Israel at the Lebanese border when we heard about the first plane hitting the World Trade Center.

During a UJA Past Chairs' Mission to Israel during which the 9/11 attacks took place, Julia Koschitzky (holding Israeli flag) and Rabbi Plaut (middle row, 2nd from right) watched the terror unfolding a world away.

Together we watched in disbelief the terrors unfolding in New York and Washington, commenting that it was ironic that we, who were visiting Israel up in Metullah, felt safer and more secure than the families we had left behind in North America.

Immediately, Rabbi Plaut's concern was whether he would be able to fly back to Toronto in time to deliver his Rosh Hashanah sermon at Holy Blossom Temple as flights were being cancelled and curtailed due to security concerns. His sense of responsibility to his congregants weighed so heavily upon him that he decided not to take any chances in delaying his return with the other participants but rather to find an earlier alternative route home. I believe he made it just in time and no doubt he spoke about this experience from his pulpit.

This may have been one of Rabbi Plaut's last trips to Israel, the country he lovingly spoke about on so many occasions. This is the way I choose to remember Rabbi Plaut - always fully engaged in life, keeping up with people thirty years younger than him and never complaining about physical exhaustion even though he may have felt it. He was always ready to share his thoughts and commentaries of events in such an articulate and thoughtful manner, while always embracing every Jew from every stream of Jewish life with sensitivity and inclusiveness.

Our community feels blessed to have had Rabbi Gunther Plaut as our great statesman for so many long and productive years, guiding, advising and interpreting Jewish values not only to our own families but also to the Canadian community at large.

On a personal note, I will forever remember sharing the trauma of 9/11 with such a unique and impressive human being. May his precious memory be a blessing and a glory to his people.

Carrots: Inexpensive, healthy

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

Carrots are my go-to veggie – always in season and cheaper than any other vegetable out there. They are delicious cooked or fresh, and you can always count on them to lend colour and fibre to any meal. They are also all over the place when it comes to their colour. They come in the popular orange we all recognize, but also in white, red, yellow, purple (yes purple) and everything in between.

On top of being the "pretty" vegetable, carrots are a terrific source of potassium, manganese, foliate, phosphorus, magnesium and vitamins A, B1, B3, B6, C and K.

So now I've got all these carrots and I only needed 2 pounds for the soup I was making. I figured that since I had them, I might as well use them all at once because, well, I just cook that way. I went digging for carrot recipes that were just a little bit different and easy to make and delicious enough that even the most finicky of non-veggie lovers would like.

CARROT SLAW

6 medium carrots, shredded
1/2 a head of green cabbage, shredded
1/2 a head of red cabbage, shredded.
4 green onions, sliced thin
2/3 cup òf mayonnaise
1 tbsp. sugar
1 1/2 tbsp. orange juice
salt and pepper to taste
1/2 to 1 cup salted sunflower seeds

In a large bowl, combine the carrots, green onions and cabbage. Toss to combine. In another bowl, combine the mayonnaise, sugar and orange juice. Whisk to combine and season with salt and pepper to taste. Pour the dressing over the carrot mixture and toss to coat. Refrigerate for at least 1 hour but up to 6 hours before serving. Sprinkle the sunflower seeds over the top and serve. Serves 10 to 12.

PARSNIPS AND CARROTS WITH HONEY AND ROSEMARY

Modified from Bon Appétit November 2007, submitted by Molly Stevens

Anti-Israel group urges boycott of Sears and Cirque

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Supporters of the campaign to boycott Israel are once again targeting Canadian retailers, and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has launched a counter-campaign.

The latest call for a boycott of Israeli products is aimed at Sears Canada.

A group called Canadians for Peace and Justice in the Middle East (CPJME) has asked the retail giant to drop several Israeli-made products that it carries, including Ahava cosmetics, Keter Plastic and Stanley Israel products. The group says that many of the firms' "products are sourced and manufactured in illegal colonies located in the occupied Palestinian territories," it wrote in a Jan. 17 letter erroneously addressed to former Sears president and CEO Dene L. Rogers.

Sara Saber-Freedman

Sears said it would not comment on the matter, and the chain is continuing to sell the Israeli-made products.

In response CIJA, through its Buycott Israel initiative – started in 2009 to encourage consumers to support Israeli-made products in response to boycott actions – sent out an alert to its followers last week to shop en masse at Sears.

Sara Saber-Freedman, Montreal-based executive vice-president of CIJA and the lead on the Buycott file, said her organization is aware of the group and that its tactics are increasingly being marginalized.

"We've seen a real decrease in the overall number of boycott calls in Canada over the last year or so, largely because those calls have proven to be such consistent failures," she said. "By acting together through programs like Buycott, we send a strong message to those who oppose a two-state solution and see boycott of Israel as a way to attain that objective."

Saber-Freedman added: "CJPME is one, but not the only player in the Canadian BDS movement. Groups like Independent Jewish Voices and Tadamon also issue boycott calls as a way of mobilizing their own base. However, these groups are learning that… calling for a boycott can have disastrous consequences, leading to a very public defeat for the anti-Israel group."

The "buycott" strategy has worked well for CIJA in the past.

In 2009, hundreds of pro-Israel consumers converged on a mid-town Toronto LCBO outlet to counter a call to boycott Israeli wines. Within a few hours, the store had sold out of its stock of about 150 cases of Israeli wine.

Last year, Saber-Freedman's initiative helped dispel rumours that the Bay had removed Ahava beauty products from its shelves as part of a boycott request from CJPME.

The Bay had in fact temporarily removed the products from its stores in order to make room for a rebranded Ahava line that it continues to sell.

In related news, earlier this month CJPME also wrote to Cirque du Soleil asking the popular acrobatic troupe to cancel its scheduled August performances in Tel Aviv as part of a cultural boycott.

Cirque du Soleil will make its first trip to Israel to perform its Alegria show this summer.

The troupe did not return a request for comment by The CJN's deadline.

Also last week, the buycott campaign called on Vancouverites to frequent local-area beauty store Lavan Body, Mind & Soap, which was also targeted by various anti-Israel boycotters who demonstrated in front of the store just prior to Valentine's Day.

Kenney halts funding to Palestine House

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Jason Kenney

Citizenship and Immigration Canada has stopped funding a settlement program administered by a Palestinian non-profit in Mississaugua, Ont.

The Palestine House Educational and Cultural Centre (Palestine House) issued a Feb. 14 statement denouncing the move and claiming its services and clients will be adversely affected.

It accused Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, of advancing a "silencing campaign" against organizations "that act or speak in support of the basic human rights of the Palestinian people."

The ministry did not respond to queries by The CJN in time for deadline. According to reports, Palestine House received $950,000 from Ottawa last year and has received funding for the past 18 years to provide services to the Palestinian community in the Toronto area.

A Feb. 14 report on Mississauga.com stated Kenney sent a letter to Palestine House in January indicating the funding would cease due to concerns of the non-profit's "pattern of support for extremism."

In the report, a spokesperson for the minister said Palestine House has in the last few years aligned itself with terrorist causes, including celebrating the release of terrorists and honouring the founder of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), one of the groups that formed the Palestine Liberation Organization and "in the 1960s and '70s, was responsible for numerous armed attacks and aircraft hijackings." Palestine House says it denounces all forms of terrorism and extremism.

CIJA, UJA send Pesach supplies to Cuba

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Jews of Cuba just became more gastronomically prepared for Pesach.

In an effort to bring holiday foodstuffs to the tiny island community of 1,500 families, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto partnered to send a Feb. 14 shipment of kosher-for-Passover fare down south. The shipment contained 924 cases of foodstuffs totalling 20,157 pounds, along with 110 cases of wine supplied by Mazel Wines.

Foods included were salmon, sardines, tuna, horseradish, consommés, gefilte fish, matzah, matzah meal, tomatoes, cabbage and mushroom soups, tea, detergent, macaroons and grape juice. Funding for the shipment comes from federation's annual global seder telethon and campaign.

Second Limmud Winnipeg offers huge variety

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Torah and Israel. Jewish life in modern day Africa, music, dance and exercise are among the topics and activities to be featured at Limmud Winnipeg's second annual event Feb. 25 and 26 at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Limmud is a grassroots movement that promotes Jewish learning in a variety of ways. Started in London, England 30 years ago, it has spread all over the world in the last 10 years. There are now Limmud programs in Toronto; several American cities; Sao Paulo, Brazil; Buenos Aries; Cape Town, Johannesberg and Durban in South Africa, as well as throughout Europe and Israel.

"We have an incredibly exciting and amazing lineup of speakers," says Faye Rosenberg Cohen, planning director at Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and one of the Limmud Winnipeg organizers.

Confirmed speakers from out of town include a trio of prominent rabbis. Rabbi Barbara Aiello is Italy's first woman rabbi and first non-Orthodox rabbi. Although American-born and trained, she traces her ancestry on her father's side to southern Italy. She has a particular interest in working with children and adults with special needs.

Rabbi Saul Berman is a longtime associate professor of Jewish studies at Yeshiva University's Stern College for Women. He also teaches Jewish law at Columbia University and he was the first fellow (2009-2010) of the Tikvah Center for Law and Jewish Civilization at the New York University law school.

Rabbi Moshe Edelman has been the director of leadership development for the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism since 1992 and is in great demand as a teacher and lecturer.

Benyamin Cohen is a journalist and author – and the son of a rabbi – who spent 52 weeks attending a variety of American churches, an experience he described in a book called My Jesus Year: A Rabbi's Son Wanders the Bible Belt in Search of his Own Faith. He will be talking about how the spiritual journey deepened his appreciation for Judaism.

David Epstein is a teacher who has taught all over the world. For the past 10 years, he has been working with the Abayudaya, Ugandans who practice Judaism.

Eli Rubinstein is a Jewish storyteller from Toronto, national director of March of the Living, and the spiritual leader of Congregation Habonim. Michael Soberman, Rubinstein's fellow speaker from Toronto, is UIA Federations Canada's director of national initiatives for the next generation.

Shlomo Weinish, a former shaliach to the Minneapolis area, will speak about entrepreneurship in northern Israel and Arab-Jewish business partnerships in northern Galilee.

Jackie Stromer is an American emergency medical technician who will speak about his volunteer work with Hatzala, volunteer Jewish emergency teams in New York.

The arts will be represented by dancer and choreographer Moy Covalin, the former artistic director of the Fetsival Aviv in Mexico City; Argentine-born Sephardi Cantor Ramon Tasat, who is active in the Washington, Maryland area, and the chassidic Moroccan-born Israeli-American rapper, Brody.

The event will also include a number of local speakers. For a complete list of presenters, go to limmudwinnipeg.org.

Rosenberg-Cohen reports that about 350 Winnipeggers registered for the inaugural Limmud Winnipeg last year. "We are hoping to have at least as many, if not more, in attendance this year," she says.

Among the communal sponsors for Limmud Winnipeg are the federation, the Chesed Shel Emes, Congregation Etz Chayim, Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Herzlia Adas Yeshurun Synagogue, Rady JCC, Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education and the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Gary Carter

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

Former Montreal Expo great Gary Carter's death to cancer Feb. 17 at only age 57 was not unexpected, but the news still rattled Jewish fans who either knew him personally or were ardent followers of "Kid" Carter during his decade in Montreal.

At the time of his diagnosis only last May, Johnny Elias, a friend for 35 years from the time Carter was a fixture at Elias' now defunct Grand Slam Baseball School in Cote St. Luc, expressed shock at the news.

Due to an early production deadline for the Feb. 23 issue a detailed article will appear in the March 1 issue.

Iran attack spells 'trouble' for Israeli market

Ram Ozeri
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Israel's capital market has correlated almost entirely with those in the developing world since 2009, but the trend seems to be breaking down this year. Tel Aviv's leading indices are on the upswing, but they have started losing ground to the MSCI emerging markets (MXEF) index. One explanation cites mounting discussion of a potential Israeli attack on Iran.

Several U.S. media outlets have been reporting hints that Israel intends to bomb Iran's nuclear facilities within the next few months. A Washington Post article said U.S. Secretary of Defence Leon Panetta believes there is a strong likelihood Israel will strike Iran this spring. NBC charted the flight paths and described the missiles that might be used. Iran, for its part, warned that its response would be "painful," and would include bombing Israel in return and closing the Strait of Hormuz, a vital route for transporting oil.

U.S. President Barack Obama, referring to such a possibility, said he didn't think Israel has made a decision on the matter, the New York Times reported. But, the paper reports, Obama says he understands Israel's concerns. The president also said the administration doesn't see any evidence that Iran has any intention or ability to attack the United States. He said nothing, however, on Iran's intention or ability to strike Israel.

How would Israel's stock market react in the case of an escalation?

"Every war brings the market down for the first few days," said Yoram Gabai, chair of Peilim Investment Portfolio Management. "What happens afterward depends entirely on whether the war's end is within sight. The market understands the violence is temporary and corrects itself quickly when the decision on a ceasefire is in Israel's hands, or when the U.S. attacks and the outcome is certain. If things are heading toward escalation or a lengthy conflict, the market will keep dropping."

Take the performance of the benchmark Tel Aviv-100 Index during major military conflagrations in recent decades. The capital market bounced back rapidly each time Israel or the United States initiated and was capable of ending the war. But whenever the conflict dragged on inconclusively, the capital market languished.

During the Second Lebanon War, for instance, investors quickly understood that the fighting wouldn't profoundly affect the economy, Gabai said. "After three or four days, Hezbollah already had asked [then-prime minister Ehud] Olmert for a ceasefire," he explained. "The market knew this so the recovery began on the fourth day, even though fighting continued in the north."

An even better example of a military conflict not affecting the market was Operation Cast Lead in Gaza three years ago, when Israel maintained the initiative throughout, said Gabai, a former Ministry of Finance budget director. "The Palestinians didn't shoot at all and Israel could have ended the operation at any point. The market fell only one day and then resumed climbing."

The First Lebanon War and the Al-Aqsa intifadah are the other side of the coin. "The First Lebanon War is the perfect example of going to war without knowing how to get out," Gabai said. "Israel demolished Lebanon's political system, creating anarchy, and couldn't withdraw. As a result the markets sunk, Israel's economy collapsed, and inflation took off."

The Al-Aqsa intifadah 10 years ago had a similar effect. "Both [then-Palestinian Authority chair Yasser] Arafat and [then-prime minister] Ehud Barak thought at the time that if there wasn't an agreement there would definitely be an escalation," Gabai said. "The market understood that a lengthy conflict lay ahead and this led to three or four years of drops on the stock market and negative economic growth in real terms. This was on top of the direct damage caused by the uprising."

The most fascinating example of the connection between a military conflict and the capital market was the Gulf War. The TA-100 dropped about 20 per cent in the first seven trading days after Iraq invaded Kuwait in August 1990. The recovery began the day the Americans attacked Iraq in January 1991. "The moment victory was clear, the market began rising, even though missiles had just begun falling on Israel," Gabai said.

In the event of an attack on Iran, the market can be expected to fall for several days at first, but past experience shows that what happens afterward largely depends on who does the attacking.

"If it's the U.S. that attacks, it will obviously determine the war's fate relatively quickly," he said. "So even if the market falls it will recover fairly quickly – even if Israel is hit."

But if Israel decides to strike alone, that will be an entirely different story. "In this case we'd be in trouble. The Iranians could close the Strait of Hormuz and just fire long-range missiles at Israel."

Gabai assumes that if the United States doesn't start the war, it won't interfere later, either. This leads him to conclude that Israel can't attack Iran on its own. "Israel can't protect its population from a missile attack," he claims. "We saw this in the Gulf War. Without the ability to prevail and no mechanism to bring a ceasefire, the conflict could last for months. In this case the markets will obviously fall drastically."

In war, like investing, you need an exit strategy before starting out, Gabai concluded.

Leave God alone

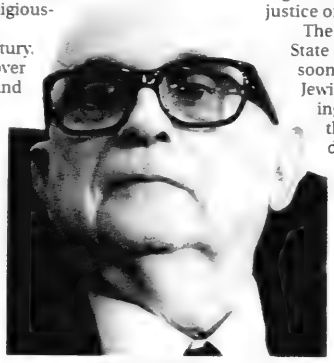
We might have expected the Jewish People would have learned from our history just how dangerous it is to base policy on a supposedly divine edict. But that is not what is happening among some parts of the religious-Zionist community.

In the 16th century, King Philip II ruled over Spain and Portugal and their large empire. In 1588, the king, who was extremely religious, sent the Spanish Armada to fight against "heretic" Britain. His advisers warned him the weather was expected to be stormy, but he responded that Jesus would not allow those fighting on his behalf to fail. The outcome is well-known.



Yehezkel Dror

This is an obvious example of the confusion between religious faith and statesmanship, one in which faith is used inappropriately to justify a certain policy while relying on the assistance of the Almighty to bring about a miracle.

Treating divine order as the source of morals and good deeds is justified, but it is wrong to use an edict of that kind as the basis for policy.

The ability to adjust to specific circumstances was essential for the survival of the Jews in the Diaspora

A policy that is not concomitant with what our sages called "the way the world continues as usual" will end in disaster, as was demonstrated by the Crusades and the religious wars in Europe, among others. That is why religions with experience of statesmanship learned to hope for God's help, to declare naively that "in God we trust," but to avoid the mistaken illusion that human beings can know what the Creator's intention is and that He will intervene in human history according to their way of thinking.

This was clear to the sages when they declared that "prophecy has disappeared from Israel," forbade people to rely on miracles and declared that there was no longer a "right of the fathers."

On a deeper level, at the heart of this concept is the divine declaration: "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways My ways" (Isaiah, 55:8). In this respect, the distinction between justifying a judgment and accepting a judgment is relevant, that is, coming to terms with the fact that human beings cannot comprehend the justice of God's actions.

The establishment of the State of Israel – in which, soon, almost half of the Jewish People will be living – and victories in the War of Independence and the Six Day War were dramatic events that many believed were miracles of divine intervention. These feelings about the success of Zionism can be understood from sociological and psychological points of view. However, among some parts of the religious-Zionist community, they evoked demands for a policy they believe comes from the Almighty – out of an assurance that He will help us if we merely keep his commandments, as they interpret them.

We might have expected that Jewish history – the destruction of the first and second Temples, the exile, the expulsion from Spain, and especially the Holocaust – would have taught all of us that the way in which God has acted is beyond human understanding. Instead, God has given human beings the intelligence to weigh the wisdom of their deeds, while combining values and faith with an understanding of reality and its limitations, and accepting responsibility for decisions and their results.

This is not what is happening among some parts of the Israeli public.

Basing our right to this land on its being the "promised land" is justified from the believer's point of view, even if there is no clear historic and halachic mapping of its borders. Religious faith can espouse the commandment of settlement in all of the promised land. But this is a commandment that has no timetable. It does not free the believer from a duty to balance it with other precepts, including ensuring the existence and well-being of the Jewish state and seeking peace.

Those who believe they are permitted to act based on what they believe to be the Lord's commandment would do well to remember the passage from Proverbs (28:14): "Happy is the man that feareth always, but he that hardeneth his heart shall fall into evil," and compare it with the claim that one who believes will never fear – a kind of magical adage that is contrary to the principles of Judaism and smacks of hubris, which is most dangerous and causes people to delude themselves that they are able to understand God's ways.

The ability to adjust to specific circumstances the way in which the commandments are upheld accompanied the Jews during the years of the Diaspora and was essential for their survival. Those who died sanctifying God's name are worthy of esteem, but had they not been a small minority, the Jewish people would have been annihilated. It is worth rereading the letters of Maimonides about the duty to live, even at the price of supposedly converting to Christianity or Islam, following which speedy efforts should be made to migrate to another country in which it is possible to return to living as Jews.

Judaism and Zionism are fundamentalist beliefs (just as are democracy, atheism and any firm belief). Fundamentalism tends to produce a fanatic minority of people who enter into sacred places even though they are not prepared for it. When their senses are harmed, they twist their belief and, instead of being a theory of how to live, it becomes a hallucination that leads to devastation. There is no point in complaining to them about this, but it is a duty and a "mitzvah" to confront those who follow them, from the moral and practical points of view.

UN General Assembly calls for Assad's removal

Shlomo Shamir
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — The 193-nation UN General Assembly ratcheted up the pressure on Syrian President Bashar Assad last Thursday by overwhelmingly approving a resolution that endorses an Arab League plan calling for him to step aside.

The resolution, similar to one Russia and China vetoed in the Security Council on Feb. 4, received 137 votes in favour, 12 against and 17 abstentions, though three countries said their votes failed to register on the electronic board.

Russia and China were among those opposing the resolution, which was drafted by Saudi Arabia and submitted by Egypt on behalf of Arab states. Unlike in the Security Council, there are no vetoes in the General Assembly, but its decisions lack the legal force of council resolutions.

"Today the UN General Assembly sent a clear message to the people of Syria – the world is with you," U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Susan Rice said in a statement.

"An overwhelming majority of UN member states have backed the plan put forward by the Arab League to end the suffering of Syrians," she said. "Bashar Assad has never been more isolated."

The resolution said the assembly "fully supports" the Arab League plan aimed at halting Syria's 11-month crackdown on anti-Assad demonstrators and urges UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon to appoint a special envoy to Syria.

It also condemns Damascus for "widespread and systematic violations of human rights" and calls for the withdrawal of Syrian forces from towns and cities. The United Nations says more than 5,400 civilians have been killed in the uprising.

Syrian Ambassador Bashar Ja'afari rejected the resolution, telling the assembly it was part of a plot to overthrow Syria's government and allow the "terrorist" opposition to take over the country. "We have deep concerns vis-a-vis the real intentions of the countries that have co-sponsored this draft, particularly that these countries are leading a political and media aggression against Syria," he said.

Those countries, Ja'afari said, are providing "all media, financial and political support to the armed terrorist groups and securing them coverage in international fora."

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said the resolution "reflects the worrying trend ... to attempt to isolate the Syrian leadership, to reject any contact with it and to impose an external formula for a political settlement."

Earlier this week, Arab countries rejected proposed Russian amendments to the resolution that would have sought to blame Syria's government and opposition equally for the violence.

Western diplomats said before the vote that a large majority in favour of the resolution would increase the pressure on Assad to comply with the Arab League plan, and would highlight the isolation of Russia and China on the issue.

Iran, North Korea, Venezuela and Bolivia were among other countries that voted against the resolution and whose delegates voiced support for the Syrian government.

France and other Western powers have suggested that they would like to make a third attempt to persuade Russia not to block action on Syria in the Security Council. But UN diplomats say there are no signs Moscow is prepared to allow the 15-nation panel to pass any condemnation of Syria.

New Delhi, Bangkok arrests

JTA

NEW DELHI – Police in New Delhi arrested five suspects in connection with a bombing attack that wounded the wife of an Israeli diplomat.

New Delhi police also identified a red motorcycle that they believe was used to stick the bomb on the car carrying the wife of an Israeli Defence Ministry representative to India on her way to pick up her children from school. The driver also was injured in last week's attack.

Two Iranian men were arrested on Feb. 15 in Bangkok in connection with explosions the previous day in the Thailand capital. One of the arrested men was about to board a flight out of the country, according to reports. A third suspect, also Iranian, was arrested in Kuala Lumpur after crossing the border to Malaysia.

Also on Feb. 15, Israel's ambassador to Thailand, Itzhak Shoham, told the Associated Press that bombs found in the blown-up home of the suspects in the Bangkok bombings were similar to those used in the attacks on Israeli Embassy employees in New Delhi and Tbilisi, Georgia.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu again blamed Iran for the attacks.

"Iran's terror operations are now exposed for all to see," Netanyahu said in the Knesset plenum. "Iran is targeting innocent diplomats around the world. If this aggression isn't halted, if red lines are not clearly drawn, Iran's aggression will ultimately spread to many other countries."

Brotherhood threatens peace treaty

The Muslim Brotherhood has threatened to "review" Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel if the United States cuts aid to Egypt. Congress threatened to cut or cancel aid to Egypt after Egyptian authorities filed charges on Feb. 6 against 43 American and other foreign pro-democracy activists who worked in the country. "The aid was one of the commitments of the parties that signed the peace agreement, so if there is a breach from one side, it gives the right of review to the parties," Essam el-Erian, a senior Brotherhood leader, told Reuters in a telephone interview. Mohamed Mursi, leader of the Muslim Brotherhood-sponsored Freedom and Justice Party, said in a statement that the peace agreement "could stumble" over U.S. talk of halting the aid.

Israel strikes Gaza terrorists

Israel's Air Force struck what the military called two "terror activity sites" in the Gaza Strip. The attacks last Thursday morning were in response to four rockets fired on southern Israel Wednesday night, according to a statement from the Israel Defence Forces spokesperson. The air force pilots reported direct hits on the targets. The targets were a Hamas training centre in eastern Gaza and an Islamic Jihad training centre in central Gaza, the Palestinian Ma'an news service reported. Six people were injured in the strikes, according to the report.

Ten killed in bus crash

Nine Palestinian schoolchildren on a field trip were killed when a truck collided with their bus on a rain-soaked road in the West Bank. Dozens of elementary school-age children on the bus headed from eastern Jerusalem for Ramallah were also injured. The students were taken to Palestinian hospitals and Israeli hospitals. A teacher was also killed. The Israeli-Arab truck driver reportedly lost control of his vehicle in the bad weather. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu expressed his sorrow at the tragedy and offered the Palestinian Authority any assistance needed.

Toby Axelrod
JTA

BERLIN — A new European Jewish parliament opened in Brussels last week, the brainchild of two philanthropists on a mission to shake up the status quo.

Igor Kolomoisky and Vadim Rabinovich, the Ukrainian Jewish moguls behind the body, founded the European Jewish Union last spring and feted their new parliament in ceremonies at the EU Parliament last week. According to their invitation, 120 Jewish members of parliament were chosen by 403,810 voters from all over Europe.

But who are these representatives? And what exactly will they do? That remains a mystery.

Among the candidates in the elections were soccer star David Beckham, filmmaker Roman Polanski, comic actor Sacha Baron Cohen and fashion designer Diane von Furstenburg, as well as other famous and less-famous European Jews –many of whom never expressed an interest in running and didn't know anything about the planned parliament.

Two days before the EJU was to fete the new parliament, its website did not list the representatives' names. EJU officials declined to respond to questions from JTA about the parliament before its launch.

Igor Kolomoisky

But the agenda is simple, Rabinovich wrote in a column last month in the Jerusalem Post: European Jewry is "a broken record" and needs change.

"The same people have remained in power, and the word that describes the situation best is 'monotony,' " wrote Rabinovich, who with Kolomoisky also founded a Jewish TV news station, Jewish News One, in September.

"There is nothing horrible about change, despite the threat it poses to the elderly activists."

The description riles European Jewish leaders who were elected by their local Jewish communities. They have been telling their EU contacts not to take the newcomers seriously, including in an open letter in December that referred to Kolomoisky and Rabinovich as "two private businessmen from Ukraine."

Critics see the EJU and its parliament as a joke at best, and at worst as a stab in the back from the two Ukrainian Jewish leaders after established groups have spent decades working to rebuild Jewish life in postwar Europe after the fall of communism.

The criticism escalated last week when word spread that the EJU had invited the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the umbrella organization for 51 U.S. Jewish groups on matters of foreign policy, to attend the parliament inauguration while spurning elected leaders of local Jewish communities.

"Working with the EJU would offend European communities, and I am sure you would like to avoid that," Meyer Habib, vice-president of the French Jewish community, wrote in an e-mail to Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-chairman of the Presidents Conference.

Hoenlein led the Presidents Conference mission to Brussels before it headed to Israel. He told JTA that his organization came to meet with EU leaders and did not attend the opening of the EJU parliament.

However, Hoenlein did acknowledge that the Presidents Conference used the EJU's facilities in Brussels and that his group had accepted an offer from the EJU to charter a plane to fly the mission's participants from Brussels to Tel Aviv.

"It was their gesture, otherwise we would have been stuck in Brussels for Shabbat," Hoenlein said, noting that the CEO of the EJU, Tomer Orni, is an old friend. Orni declined to speak with JTA for this story.

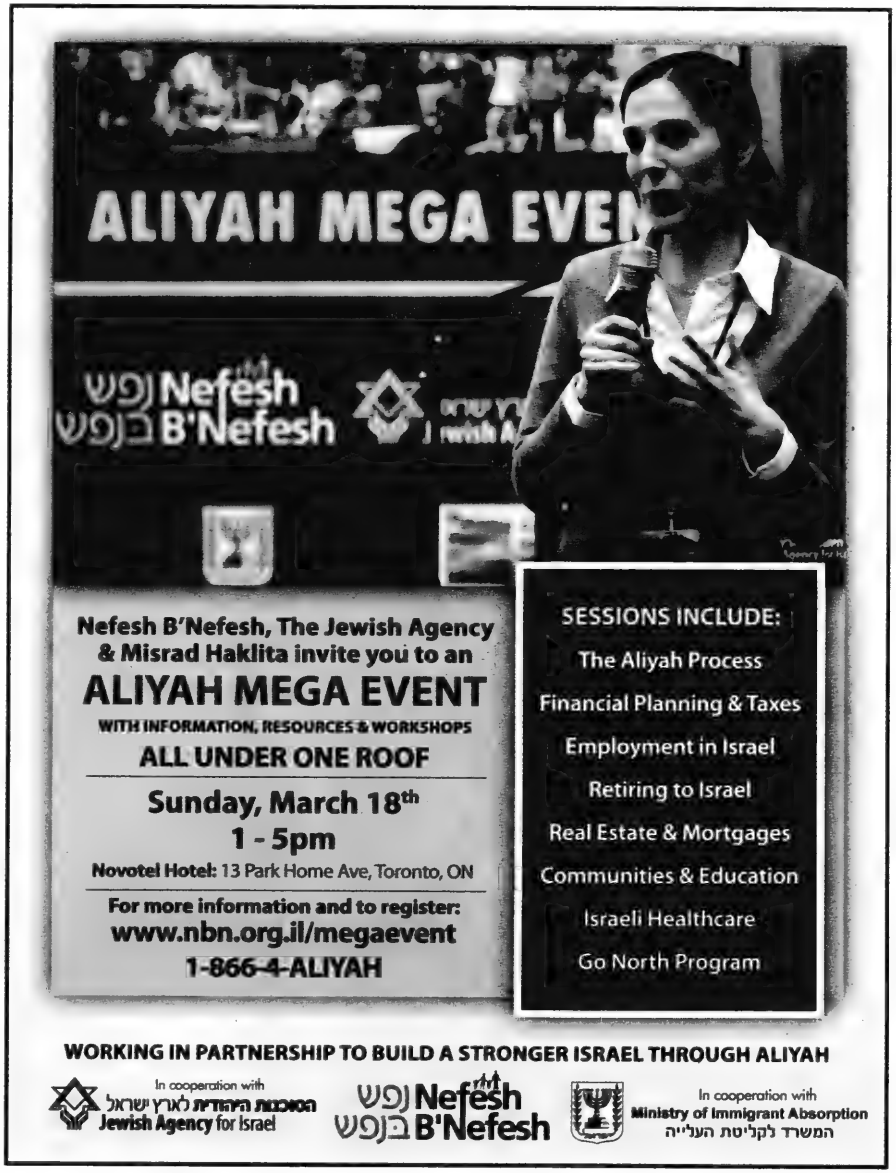
It wasn't clear whether there were any meetings in Brussels between the EJU and the Presidents Conference, but the idea that American Jewry's leading foreign policy umbrella organization might be lending credence to the EJU has riled even some American Jewish friends of European Jewish leaders.

Rabbi Andrew Baker, the American Jewish Committee's director of international Jewish affairs, told JTA that he had urged the Presidents Conference to reconsider any alliance with EJU.

"Most of the established Jewish community leadership organizations stand in a kind of formal opposition to this newly formed group," Baker said, adding that "it would be a mistake" to collaborate with them.

It's more than simple intergroup rivalry, according to Baker, noting concerns that he and European Jewish leaders have about Rabinovich's background.

Rabinovich spent nine years in a Soviet prison for theft from the state, and a 2003 New York Times report suggested that Rabinovich has been barred from entering the United States. Rabinovich, who did not respond to interview requests for this story made through his Jewish One channel, has said that his imprisonment was politically motivated and related to his being Jewish, and a state department official told JTA that it does not maintain a list of individuals barred from entering the country.



Thirteen ways of looking at Leonard Cohen

Of late, most of Leonard Cohen's output receives breathless celebration. This is a profound shift from his major work during the late 1960s, '70s and '80s, when records, which are now easily characterized as folk and pop masterpieces, were greeted with a mix of reverence and incomprehension. (Not to mention the novel, Beautiful Losers, which a major critic dubbed "the most revolting book ever written in Canada.")

Cohen's new album is receiving strong reviews; while the editorial page of the Globe and Mail saw fit to toast the release of Old Ideas with an editorial titled "Leonard Cohen, Singer of Singers," in which he is dubbed "Canada's gift to the world, at 77."

For Cohen's devoted readers, the field is a bit less lively than the music scene, though this season includes the release, from New York-based Alfred A. Knopf, of a collection titled Poems and Songs. Edited by the American academic Robert Faggen, the collection is part of Knopf's venerable Everyman's Library Pocket Poets series. Readers will be right in guessing that no Canadian poet has previously been honoured with a series volume devoted to their work. John Milton is there, as is Shakespeare, Sylvia Plath, Edgar Allan Poe, Wallace Stevens, Wordsworth and Rimbaud.

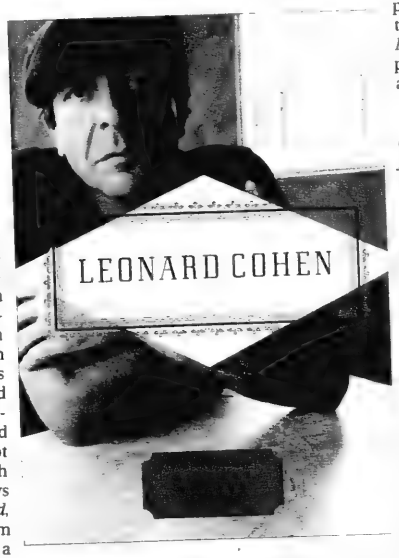
One might covet the chance to edit such a volume – brushing shoulders with Leonard and adding a contemporary hitmaker to an illustrious list of canonical figures are not undesirable experiences – but there are risks in this line of editorial work.

In the volume's foreword, Faggen argues hard for Cohen's relevance and impact. His ability to erode the "artificial boundary between poem and song" is likened to King David, the French troubadours and "St. John of the Cross's Dark Night of the Soul or St. Teresa of Avila." Faggen links Cohen to his roots in Montreal, and to his native influences, including A.M. Klein and Irving Layton, but the overall goal is to universalize the poetry and song, and characterize it, like the Globe and Mail, as a "gift to the world." This may be the inevitable outcome of the great success Cohen is experiencing in late career. But it makes it harder to appreciate his rootedness in particular traditions, like the postwar Montreal poetry scene and the late-Beat experimentation of early 1960s New York, where he joined the late stages of the folk revival of Greenwich Village.



The last substantial retrospective collection of Cohen's work appeared in 1993, under the title Stranger Music: Selected Poems and Songs. There, the approach of mixing Cohen's poems with his song lyrics received an early tryout. Selections from each book and each record appeared in chronological order, offering the reader a kind of sampler of Cohen's twin pursuits. In the new Everyman's edition, the blend of poetry and song lyric is handled more aggressively, so that the uninitiated or simply uninterested need not notice when a song lyric, such as So Long, Marianne, shows up near to One Night I Burned, which is the kind of early poem that led fans to fall for him as a poet rather than a singer-songwriter.

Exactly how a song lyric should behave when it's printed among poems is an open question, and the Everyman's collection follows the lead of Stranger Music on certain fronts. If you first encountered the lyrics to songs like Suzanne or So Long, Marianne on printed lyric sheets or in Cohen's songbooks, you will notice that the anthologized versions will sometimes behave like song lyrics:

Come over to the window, my little darling
I'd like to try to read your palm
I used to think I was some kind of gypsy boy
Before I let you take me home

In other cases, the familiar verses are squared off as prose paragraphs, the chorus tacked on in italics. In this way, Famous Blue Raincoat reads like a prose poem or the letter it poses as, with its signature, "L. Cohen":

It's four in the morning, the end of December. I'm writing you now just to see if you're better. New York is cold but I like where I'm living. There's music on Clinton Street all [through] the evening. I hear that you're building your little house deep in the desert. You're living for nothing now. I hope you're keeping some kind of record. Yes, and Jane came by with a lock of your hair. She said that you gave it to her the night that you planned to go clear. Did you ever go clear?

This transformation of the lyric seems to follow the idea that something should be done to give the works their own status as they are detached from their musical accompaniment.

It's striking, too, to read some of Cohen's most forceful work at remove from the volumes in which they originally appeared. This effect is notable in the case of the few pieces taken from Cohen's magnificent and bitter 1972 collection The Energy of Slaves. There, poem after poem denounced his own poetic choices, and poetry itself, with each piece introduced by the tiny figure of a razor blade. Somehow, the punch of Welcome to These Lines – "There is a war on/ but I'll try to make you comfortable" – is not felt in quite the same way when it's freed of its little blade. In the same way, the contrapuntal quality of the 1978 volume Death of a Ladies' Man is entirely lost. In the original format, Cohen presented a poem on the left-hand page, with its own critique or commentary on the right. In the few such installments included in the new collection, the editor must add the overt designation, "Commentary," for the reader who is unaware of the poems' original context.

The poems one receives straightforwardly, which can be read without these sorts of quibbles, are the early lyrics and later works that were either appended as uncollected poems in Stranger Music or included in the 2006 comeback volume Book of Longing.

But the back third of Poems and Songs is clear in its goal of highlighting the song lyrics, with a large gathering from Various Positions, I'm Your Man, and other less exciting albums.

Think of Wallace Steven's masterwork Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird as you read through the Everyman's version of Leonard Cohen. Since it is a "pocket" poets volume, you may recline, come spring, beneath a tree with your nylon string guitar. Consider the options. It's possible you will want to take a look back at who the singer was before he became "Canada's gift to the world."

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is The Joyful Child (Gaspereau Press). He will contribute the chapter on Canadian Jewish writing to the forthcoming Oxford Companion to Canadian Literature.

Comedy brings observant guy and secular gal together

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Can a secular, atheist Jew fall in love with an observant Jew? This is at the heart of Can I Really Date a Guy Who Wears a Yarmulke?, a fast-paced comedy by New York playwright Amy Holson-Schwartz.

The show, presented by Teatron Theatre, runs at the Studio Theatre at the Toronto Centre for the Arts from Feb. 29 to March 11.

The play, which premièred in New York City last year, draws from the life of the writer Holson-Schwartz, who is currently studying in London, England. Holson-Schwartz describes herself as a pretty committed Jewish atheist who's pretty sure she's supposed to be with a Jewish guy.

Holson-Schwartz's agent approached Teatron artistic director and founder Ari Weisberg with the script, and Weisberg loved it.

"It is a romantic comedy that tells the story of young Jews today and their dilemmas and options," Weisberg, who's also the show's director, said.

"In this particular case, we have Eleanor, a PhD candidate, who is 26 years old. Eleanor was raised as a very secular Jew, and is not sure how much Jewish identity she has or wants to have. She goes on Birthright and comes back very disappointed because of her angst vis-a-vis Judaism."

When she comes back from her Birthright trip, she is introduced to Aaron, a nice, good-looking doctor who is observant. "So here is the crux of the matter," Weisberg said. "The two are trying to breach their differences because they do enjoy each other's company and they love each other."

The Toronto-based cast of six includes Jada Rifkin – no stranger to Teatron – as Eleanor and Jesse Nerenberg, playing Aaron the doctor. Rounding out the cast are Adrianna Prosser, Scott Leaver, and Teatron Theatre veterans Reva Lawry and Ron Boyd.

Weisberg said people will not only be entertained by the show but also that audiences of all ages will relate to it. He feels it speaks to both the younger generation and to the more mature theatregoer, who may see their children and grandchildren experiencing similar situations.

"What comes out at the end of the play is that different people have their own way of reaching their goal of being Jewish. As long as you can be open to different ways, we have ways to keep our people together. It is not just a Jewish theme, it is global and in all societies. If we are open to other people's ideas and rituals, then the entire society will gain," added Weisberg, who has been at the helm of Teatron Theatre, a company devoted to producing Jewish-themed plays, for nine seasons.

Tickets at www.teatrontheatre.com, 416-781-5527 or at the Toronto Centre for the Arts box office.

Film delves into the world of the Ottoman harem

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

In Middle Eastern lore, the harem was a secluded and sacred place where female members of a royal household, including concubines, resided in complete privacy in the lap of luxury.

Long associated with the Ottoman Empire, which collapsed in 1918, the harem was invariably associated with secrecy, intrigue, sex, slavery and decadence.

David Rabinovitch, a Canadian filmmaker based in the United States, was so intrigued by the harem, taken from the Arabic word haram (forbidden), that he has made a two-part docudrama about it.

Hidden World of the Harem, filmed in Turkey, will be broadcast by Vision TV on Feb. 29 at 10 p.m.

Turning on the world's greatest Islamic empire, Harem is about two royal Muslim women in a seraglio who defy convention and custom in a bid for personal fulfilment.

The first woman, Princess Hatice, seeks to emancipate herself after her father, Prince Murad, is deposed as sultan in 1876 after only 93 days as sultan.

The second woman, Halide Edib, dedicates herself to women's rights and becomes a champion of Turkish nationhood after the Ottoman Empire crumbles.

"The film is entirely factual," said Rabinovitch, who launched his career at CBC Radio in Toronto when he was still a teenager and who later produced the popular TV series Take 30, with Adrienne Clarkson. "The characters, the scenes and the dialogue are all inspired by memoirs, documents and contemporary accounts."

He added, "We researched the locations where the events of the story take place and interviewed descendants. Istanbul is an exotic location, and I had long wanted to make a film there."

In developing the script, he and his daughter, Zara, benefited from the insights of scholars in Turkey and North America.

Rabinovitch's interest in "hidden histories" led him to this topic.

"My previous mini-series, Secret Files of the Inquisition, was based on original research into church archives," said Rabinovitch, who lives in Seattle but whose production company is in Winnipeg.

Adapted from previously unreleased documents, Secret Files of the Inquisition told the story of the Catholic Church's struggle to remain the world's only true Christian faith.

In his current project, Rabinovitch seeks to give names, faces and emotions to the women in the imperial Ottoman harem.

He was fortunate to find the palaces, villas and city angles necessary to recreate 19th-century Istanbul.

"That's not an easy thing to do in a 21st-century megalopolis of 16 million," said Rabinovitch, whose previous films run the gamut from The Perilous Fight: America's World War II to Hollywood Babylon. "Every location is authentic."

He and his Canadian crew worked harmoniously with a Turkish cast and crew, and Rabinovitch was thrilled to hire Turkish star Pelin Batu for the role of Halide Edip.

"I hope the film will speak on many levels," he said. "It's the story of strong women living inside the harem system and rebelling against it. It's a parable of a democratic leader kept under house arrest for decades. It's the juicy story of sexual empowerment and emancipation.

"It ends with the birth of the first secular democracy in the Islamic world, so it resonates with current events in countries like Egypt, Tunisia and Libya, where the people are trying to create democracies."

In short, Harem is a parable of sorts about our own times.

GALA DINNER AND MUSICAL EVENING AIDS YOUNG ADULTS WITH SPECIAL NEEDS

DANI (Developing and Nurturing Independence), a Toronto not-for-profit organization that creates opportunities for Jewish young adults with physical and cognitive challenges, is hosting its sixth annual evening gala dinner and evening of music, featuring singer-songwriter Baruch Levine of Toronto, whose albums are popular both here and in Israel.

Also on the program is 11-year-old child prodigy and piano sensation Ethan Bortnick, who has appeared on The Oprah Show, The Tonight Show with Jay Leno, Good Morning America and many other TV shows, and on stage with former U.S. president Bill Clinton and many show-business celebrities. He performs around the world and has helped raise nearly $30 million for charitable causes.

"Ethan stole the show," one reviewer wrote recently after seeing Bortnick, noting that "he's charming and self-assured. He easily established a rapport with his audience and told jokes... It was amazing to watch him play with those tiny hands, stretching to form the chords. But he does it with ease and advanced facility with style."

The dinner also features Judge Dan Butler. Terrace Banquet Centre, Sunday, March 18; dinner 5:30 p.m., silent auction 7 p.m., dessert reception 8 p.m. For tickets and sponsorship opportunities, visit www.dani-toronto.com, phone 905-731-6606, or e-mail gala@dani-toronto.com.

Zero Hour: American writer-actor Jim Brochu has won multiple theatrical awards for his entertaining one-man show, Zero Hour, about the life of the zany comic actor and artist Zero Mostel. Brochu's performance is energetic and gripping as he, replicating Mostel's perfect comic timing, engages in one-sided dialogue with an unseen and unheard New York Times reporter doing an interview.

Although we learn a lot about Mostel's experiences being blacklisted in the McCarthy era and perhaps not enough about his triumphs in (for example) Fiddler on the Roof and The Producers, the play, as directed by Piper Laurie, never loses steam. At the Bathurst Street Theatre, 736 Bathurst St., until March 11. $59, $69.50. 1-855-985-2787, www.ZeroHourShow.com

Documentary Screening: Prom Night in Mississippi, a 2009 feature documentary by Toronto-area producer-director Paul Saltzman, tells the story of a high-school in Charleston, Miss., that held its first-ever racially integrated prom night only in 2008, paid for by actor Morgan Freeman. Saltzman follows students, teachers and parents around in the days leading up to the prom. The camera reveals that change does not come so easily to a small southern town; some white parents forbid their children to attend the mixed prom and arrange a whites-only dance instead.

Sophie Milman

Saltzman, son of the late TV weatherman Percy Saltzman, was formerly married to filmmaker Deepa Mehta and is now married to Patricia Aquino, who co-produced Prom Night. The couple lives in the Toronto area. In 1968, Saltzman met and photographed the Beatles in India and in 2008 released a book of his acclaimed photographs.

Prom Night in Mississippi is being shown as part of the MINT Film Festival. Toronto Underground Cinema, 186 Spadina Ave. Feb. 24, 8:45 p.m. $15, $13. 416-707-1077, info@mintff.org

Names in the News: William (Captain Kirk) Shatner has been chosen to host the 2012 Juno Awards ceremony, to be broadcast on CTV on April 1. Nominees include Sophie Milman for her CD In The Moonlight, the Nylons for their CD Skin Tight and Fern Lindzon for her CD Two Kites. All three albums are competing in the category of vocal jazz album of the year.

U2 fans find what they were looking for

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

Two women found what they were looking for when they lined up for a U2 concert in Toronto last summer: an introduction into U2 fan culture.

These are not your typical fans. These people line up days in advance to see the Irish rock stars in concert.

"I had this vision that everyone was going to be in line with guitar and drumsticks and singing and happy," says Tami Falus, who lined up with Dayna Shereck for 2-1/2 days before the show began.

The two women came equipped with video cameras and lots of patience, ready to record their weekend as they waited for the doors to open. The two documented their experience in the film General Admission: Layin' It on the Line for U2.

The first-time filmmakers arrived Saturday morning and grabbed the first spots in the line for the Monday night performance.

The first day went smoothly, fitting Falus' expectations of the early birds, listening to music and chatting. However, the next day, they ran into an unexpected problem: line politics.

"There were people who showed up who had done it time and time again," Falus says. "They considered themselves line leaders and it got a little political."

These line leaders had experience camping out and had put a system in place, Falus recalls, explaining that they weren't too happy about missing the front spots in the line.

"They were trying to take the power and control and weren't thrilled that Dayna and I were doing this without doing it before," she says, explaining they had specific systems to make the lineup smoother. For example, everybody would receive a number, which would allow fans to take breaks from the line and regain their spot when they got back at designated check-in times.

However, the line leaders' experience came in handy when security at the Rogers Centre kicked everybody off the property, and the line disbursed. With the system in place, everybody was able to get back into the original order when the official line opened.

Despite being kicked off the property, Shereck and Falus didn't rest. They say they spent all night documenting the experience before arriving in the official line at about 6:00 a.m. on the Monday morning.

Shereck says these diehard U2 fans stand out from what you might see in other concerts. For example, most of them are professionals who had the time and resources to take the time off to see this expensive performance. She says many fans even came from other parts of the world specifically for the show.

"We kept finding out new things about them, that fans are just so enamoured and what lengths people will go to see them," Falus says, adding that they even came across one man who had been to all 80 shows on that particular world tour.

Another common aspect to the fans is their tendency to follow the band's lead in promoting charitable causes.

"One of the themes, if you look at people's threads through their lives, a lot of them were involved in humanitarian causes," Shereck says, including herself in this group.

"When I was young, I was influenced by the music I was listening to and the values I got through it," she says, explaining that she now works at an organization focusing on helping people with AIDS and HIV.

She refers to the concept of "U2 karma," which concerns how U2 fans treat others.

"Bono talks a lot about karma, and there's this feeling that as a U2 fan, you need to treat other people at a certain level," Shereck says. "You have to be good to people."

Dayna Shereck joins the line on the third, and official, general admission lineup.

This involves actions like not cutting into the line, offering up a place to sleep to fans travelling from far away places, or giving away extra tickets to fans who can't necessarily afford to see the concert, she says.

"It was all along the fact that we're good to each other because of this feeling of U2 karma," she says, adding that U2 tends to attract these kinds of fans more so than many other bands. "We're going to treat someone else who's in a new city, or is out of money, the way we would want to be treated."

So was spending almost three days outdoors worth it in the end?

Falus says she would gladly do it again, but only if she was seeing a concert in another country.

"I think the experience would be much different," she says. "I hear in Mexico they lined up for a week. It's more of what I think I envisioned of people lining up, playing instruments."

But both women say they loved the feeling of standing right up to the stage, looking around and seeing all their new friends.

"With the people we met, and being part of such an international thing," Shereck says, "it was very much worth it."

Manitoba curler qualifies for national championships

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The best Jewish skip from Manitoba since the days of provincial champions Terry Braunstein (Canadian Brier winner in 1965), Bobby Robinson and Hersh Lerner may well be on the way.

Only 16, Kyle Doering qualified for the M&M Meat Shops Canadian Junior Men's Curling Championship in Napanee, Ont., and got as far as the semifinals, losing to Northern Ontario 7-3. Northern Ontario went on to lose to Alberta in the championship game by a score of 9-6.

At 16, Doering was the youngest skip competing in Napanee. Back in Manitoba, playing at his home rink, the West Kildonan Curling Club, Doering upset No. 1 seed Joey Witherspoon to capture the Canola Junior Men's Provincial Championship and propel him onto the national stage.

The win over the previously undefeated Witherspoon, who had reached the 2010 Canadian Final, didn't go down to skip's rocks, either; the final was 9-3.

Joining Doering on the provincial championship team were third Colton Lott, 16, second Derek Oryniak, 17, and lead Lucas Van Den Bosch, 17.

How could a minor who is only 16 compete so successfully against opponents who range up to an age limit of 20? Well, let the modest-to-a-fault skipper tell it like it is.

"I started to curl around the age of five, when I really started taking an interest in the game. My dad [Grant] used to build a skating rink in our backyard and he turned it into a curling rink, believe it or not. He pebbled the ice and got me rocks and built hacks, so he kind of constructed a little curling rink for me to practise on, and he kind of explained to me what curling was and how it worked and all the rules and basics of it."

The devoted dad, in his day, was an outstanding AAA hockey and baseball player and a recreational curler.

"He curled in a couple leagues. Up to this day we have a family team with my dad and his two brothers and my grandpa [on Grant's side] and we curl once a week at the West Kildonan rink."

At around the age of seven, Kyle curled at his dad's rink, the Granite Curling Club, where small rocks about one-half the weight are used and thrown about half the distance.

"I started off subbing for my dad's team at age 10 and used to play lead for him. By age 12, I started to skip," he said matter-of-factly.

Doering's mom, Bonnie Lifchus Doering, is Jewish. His zaide, Billy Lifchus, who is a pharmacist in Toronto, was also a fairly decent curler in his day.

Kyle Doering

A Grade 11 honour-roll student at Garden City Collegiate, Doering spent kindergarten to Grade 8 at public schools, where he participated in Hebrew programs. He's been with his present team going on three years.

"We won the first bonspiel we ever played in. It was at the Canada Winter Games Trials. Then we went to the actual games in Halifax, where we won the bronze, defeating New Brunswick," Doering explained.

It was there that Doering made a triple-raise takeout to score a six-ender against Ontario in the round-robin part of the tournament. His shot was featured across Canada on TSN's Play of the Day.

Curling skills aside, what is the secret of Doering's success in terms of his personality and leadership traits as a skip? Doering appears wise beyond his years, with a great deal of support throughout his formative years from his dad, whom he so much admires. "I guess I started off so early and learned so much," he said.

"Curling is a game of experience. I have patience. You have to stay calm. A lot of skips slam their brush on the ice [when things don't go so well]. I stay calm. Otherwise it hurts not just me, but the team. You have to be encouraging. You have to be positive. I learned that from my dad."

Generally speaking, what is the strategy and modus operandi of the guy who may well be the youngest junior skip ever to represent Manitoba in the nationals?

"My main job is to read the ice and know where to put the broom and I have to give them good ice," he explained. "Sweeping is a huge part of the game. Fifty per cent is me and the other 50 per cent is the sweepers. I tell them when to sweep. They watch the speed and I watch the direction. My sweepers do such a great job, and I give them 110 per cent of the credit because they deserve it," Doering said.

Every skip embraces a particular strategy or philosophy against his opponents, and Doering believes strongly that "there is no wrong shot call and everyone thinks differently. It's just someone else's opinion. My specialty is the draw. We play the finesse game," he said. "We use the freeze, tap backs and like to keep a lot of rocks in play. We know when to peel the guards."

Doering not only plays well and often, but also watches the pros regularly on television. "Everything curling I follow," he said emphatically. "Kevin Martin, Jeff Stoughton, Kevin Howard, everything pretty much, I follow."

Canadians, beware, here comes the kid with the best draw in the West!

'Against the Grain' theatre brings opera to bars

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

When most people picture a night at the opera, they see tuxedos and gowns and a large, beautiful concert hall, but Toronto's Against the Grain (ATG) theatre company is creating a new, more casual way to experience opera.

There's something powerful about experiencing art in a much more intimate setting," said the theatre company's musical director Christopher Mokrzewski, 27.

ATG brings together professional musicians and performers for opera and classical music shows at small bars and art galleries. The venues are selected for their atmosphere's suitability to the performance piece and for their acoustics.

Mokrzewski, an accomplished pianist who has worked extensively with the Canadian Opera Company, has been a part of ATG since last year, when it was founded by artistic director Joel Ivany.

The idea, Mokrzewski explained, is to present the audience with great art on their own terms. As its quirky and charming website explains, ATG would like audience members to listen to "an aria while you curl up on a couch."

The attitude is not yet a popular one in opera circles, but the ATG style is gaining steam. So far, its experimentation in venue and musical arrangement has garnered the theatre company rave reviews in Toronto's art scene.

"I think what we do is important in attracting new audiences," Mokrzewski said, adding that while there is always a place for traditional opera performances, the casual and close-up atmosphere of a bar will bring in people who might not feel as comfortable at a concert hall.

"I think people respond to what's different about it and what's most visceral," he said.

ATG first made waves on Toronto's art scene in December, with its sold-out performance of Puccini's La Bohème (translated from Italian to English for the audience's ease in understanding) at the Tranzac Club, a bar popular with the downtown indie music crowd.

Now, ATG is preparing a production of German-Jewish composer Kurt Weil's The Seven Deadly Sins, set to be performed in March, at Toronto's Gallery 345.

The lead soprano for the show, Lindsay Sutherland Boal, 35, agrees with Mokrzewski about the enhanced intimacy between the audience and the performers at small, unconventional venues.

"I think that you can experience so much more when you can see it and feel it and hear it and taste it when it's that close," she said, adding that she feels this type of performance is the future of performing arts.

"You're saying, 'We want you, we want you involved, we want to include you,'" added ATG's general manager Nancy Hitzig, who, along with Mokrzewski, represents the Jewish members of the executive.

Hitzig, 25, who has worked with the baroque theatre company Opera Atelier, said her day job as a fundraiser for the Institute for Canadian Citizenship has helped her in attracting diverse audiences for ATG performances, what she calls "bridging the gap" between traditional and newer opera-goers.

"The established classical music audience is coming with us because they're seeing new and innovative ways of presenting their favourite works," she said. They also get to enjoy the same calibre of performers that they might see in a concert hall. "They're not amateurs, they're really powerful and they perform tremendous art," said Hitzig.

Even among the veteran opera audience, the less familiar crowds have no reason to feel intimidated in the casual settings where ATG holds shows.

"I have had so many friends tell me how excited they are that they can drink beer and listen to classical music," she added with a smile.

The thrill of the relaxed environment is not just for the audience's benefit.

"I rather enjoy the places that we work, and it's a great opportunity for us to, so to speak, let down our hair," said Mokrzewski. "I can drink beer while I'm playing, which I like doing, but is not always OK in other circumstances," he added, laughing.

Though, it's surely not just the beer that's making the crowds and the musicians happy.

"There's a power that comes with just being 100 people in the room, where it's just you, and the artist, and the piano, and your friends, and strangers," said Hitzig.

She added that while many performing-arts companies are struggling to get a younger audience in the door, ATG is having no trouble appealing to the next generation of opera patrons.

The youthful, vibrant energy in the audience gives the ATG performers a greater opportunity to discover new ways to display their art.

"What's wonderful about our group is that we're not hindered by conventional boundaries, and consequently, I think we can really explore all our options musically and artistically," said Mokrzewski. "It's good to be able to do what you want."

nina.shenhav@gmail.com

"זה היה רוחני ברמות. חופשה מדהימה!" טלי לוגמת בהנאה מהקפה, תוך כדי שהיא דוחפת לידיי האומללות שלל של תמונות. אני נאלצת, לאחר מאבקים הרישיים, להתבונן בהן. הנה היא מצולמת עם בעלה באיזה יער מוזר, והנה היא שוב עם בעלה המוזר, כניראה באיתו יער. "היית צריכה לראות את העצים שם, נינה." היא אומרת בחולמניות. "ואת העתיקות! עוד לא הגעת לתמונות עם העתיקות!" והנה שוב טלי, והמוזר שלה באתר בנייה נטוש. ליד הבית שלי בונים, היה לה יותר זול לראות שם גרוטאות.

טלי:היא תאמין? הרי לשמוע על טיול של אחרים, זה טיפה, איך לומר משעמם?

Dreaming about war

Judaism believes that prophecy can come through dreams. In the Torah, Joseph's dream about the years of plenty and the years of famine was relayed to Pharaoh, and it ultimately helped him form a strategy for ancient Egypt in dealing with its food supply. Through his dream, Joseph also gained parole and became an important man in the house of Pharaoh.

Abraham Lincoln dreamed of his own assassination.

Freud believed that dreams are rooted in sexual desire. Carl Jung, who parted ways with Freud, disagreed, and said that "every dream image represents a creative process that relates to the collective archetype of the soul," author Klaus Vollmar writes in The Little Giant Encyclopedia of Dream Symbols.

The walls of my own dreams expand so that one is oblong and another is rhombus, and the characters are diminutively tall.

One snowy night, I dreamed of Israel and saw her strategy to deal with Iran and its purported nuclear bomb. The plan was Evian-clear. In my dream, the Israel Defense Forces launched an attack against Iran, seeing that their "spring" was getting warmer, understanding that the Iranian Mujahedeen welcomed such an attack, as it secured their leadership in a pan-Islamic region and their place in heaven as martyrs. I saw this – an embrace of mass destruction and death – as Iran's advantage over Israel and the Jewish people.

In my dream, assassinations of nuclear scientists had been exhausted, and a clandestine plan to employ Iranian workers to blow up the reactors from the inside was deemed impossible because of heightened security. I saw Israel fighting on many fronts. I dreamed that I met with Israel's leadership and got a heads up on the attack, but that a plan to protect Diaspora Jewry was weak because our populations were too widespread.

When I woke up, every facet of Israel's blueprint for war, every detail, sat tidily in my imagination, folded there by my dream state.

The Talmud says that dreams will be fulfilled according to the interpretation given them. Bad dreams can be interpreted as good, and therefore no ill effects from those dreams will ever actually occur. Similarly, one has the option of going through hatavat chalom – a process that makes a dream good.

The Talmud says that if one has a nightmare, he or she can fast, even on Shabbat, when fasting is disallowed (except for Yom Kippur), although the person must fast another day for fasting on Shabbat. It is understood that a bad dream can cause depression in a person.

Rabbi Berel Wein, a Torah scholar, author and teacher, reminds us that the Talmud also states that "even a semi-prophetic dream contains within it fanciful visions which are inaccurate…

"Just as grain cannot be without chaff, so, too, dreams cannot be without inaccuracies and a touch of nonsense. How to separate the chaff from the grain, the nonsense from the message, lies in the dream's interpretation."

In his book, Vollmar writes that when people dream about war, they are expressing a fear of war and/or confrontation between different parts of the personality of the dreamer – the inner conflict.

Israel versus Iran. Is my dream semi-prophetic, or merely a reflection of battles going on inside of me, my "inner conflict"? Should I fast? Should I go through a hatavat chalom? Should I prepare myself, my family, my community for the brutal eventualities of war and antisemitism?

Sweet dreams.

Netanyahu to visit Ottawa this week

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is scheduled to make a three-day stop in Ottawa this week before a March 5 visit to Washington.

Netanyahu plans to meet with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper on March 2, spend Shabbat in Ottawa, and then speak at a Jewish community Sunday breakfast briefing with lay leaders and other delegates before leaving for the United States later that day.

It's anticipated the two leaders will address Israel's plans regarding the continued escalation of Iran's nuclear program.

Harper's director of communications, Andrew MacDougall, told The CJN he expects they'll discuss "the security situation in the Middle East."

Harper has publicly stated he fears Iran would use nuclear weapons if it acquires them. In an interview with the CBC in January, he said he believes Iran is lying about its nuclear program being strictly for peaceful purposes and that he thinks its leaders would have "no hesitation about using nuclear weapons if they see them achieving their religious or political purposes."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has said that Israel should be "wiped off the map" and that the "Zionist regime is on its way to annihilation." He is also a noted Holocaust denier.

Since coming to power in 2006, the Conservative government has shown unwavering support for the Jewish state on the global stage. Harper helped water down resolutions at the G8 summit last year that he considered to be weighted against Israel, and Canada was vocal at the United Nations last fall when the Palestinian Authority tried to get the General Assembly to recognize a unilateral declaration of independence.

The two prime ministers have reportedly also become fast friends.

Reward Doubled

TORONTO — York Regional Police have doubled their reward for information leading to a conviction in a rash of hate crimes in Vaughan, Ont., in 2004. Overnight on March 14 and 15, 2004, black spray paint was used to deface homes and vehicles with swastikas and antisemitic messages. The $40,000 reward remains in effect until Jan. 31, 2013.

CIJA Files Protest

OTTAWA — The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has formally objected to a proposal by the National Campus and Community Radio Association (NCRA) to regulate itself with its own code of conduct, citing a resolution the NCRA adopted at its 2011 annual general meeting to support boycotts, divestment and sanctions (BDS) against Israel.

CIJA submitted a brief on the matter to the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission on Feb. 16, in response to the regulator's calls for comments. NCRA members are currently subject to the Canadian Association of Broadcasters' Code of Ethics. CIJA said the NCRA's BDS policy would "assert itself on Canadian airwaves… if the NCRA is allowed to self-regulate."

WORLD

Anti-Israel Scientist

TEHRAN — The wife of an assassinated Iranian nuclear scientist said that her husband's "ultimate goal was the annihilation of Israel." Fatemeh Bolouri Kashani, wife of Mostafa Ahmadi Roshan, told the Fars News Agency last week that her husband was highly supportive of people who fight for Palestinians' rights against Israel. Roshan, a chemistry professor and deputy director of commerce at Iran's Natanz enrichment facility, was killed by a car bomb in January. He's one of at least four Iranian nuclear scientists to have been killed in anonymous attacks since January 2010. Iran blames Israel's Mossad intelligence agency and America's Central Intelligence Agency.

Anne Frank 'Baptized' in Mormon Ritual

NEW YORK — Anne Frank was "baptized" in a Mormon proxy ritual, the third Shoah victim found to have been baptized posthumously last month.

Anne Frank

The ceremony reportedly took place in a Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints temple in the Dominican Republic. It was uncovered by Helen Radkey, an ex-Mormon who is now a whistleblower on such activity.

Only Mormons have access to the church's genealogy database, which can also be used to submit a deceased person's name for proxy baptism.

The discovery comes shortly after reports the parents of Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal were posthumously baptized. Wiesenthal was a Shoah survivor who died in 2005. His mother was killed by the Nazis in 1942.

Posthumous baptism allows members of the church to stand in for the deceased to offer them a chance to join the church in the afterlife. After meetings with Jewish leaders in 2010, the church agreed to halt the practice.

Anne Frank was posthumously baptized at least a dozen times between 1989 and 1999, Radkey told the Huffington Post.

Also last month, the names of the father and grandfather of Holocaust survivor and author Elie Wiesel were found to have been submitted for proxy baptism.

Wiesel called on Mitt Romney, the frontrunner in the race for the Republican U.S. presidential nomination, to tell his church to stop performing posthumous proxy baptisms of Holocaust victims.

Chief Visits Israel

JERUSALEM — Grand Chief David Harper of the Manitoba Keewatinowi Okimakanak, a group that represents 30 native communities in northern Manitoba, visited the Knesset last week while in Israel on a solidarity mission. Harper toured the Knesset and met with the deputy minister for development of the Negev and Galilee, Ayoob Kara. The trip was organized by a Knesset lobby group that promotes relations with Christians worldwide, the Arutz Sheva news agency reported.

Groups counter yearly apartheid slur

'This is about truth versus falsehood'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A number of campaigns on Canadian campuses are in the works to give pro-Israel students the tools to counter false accusations presented by Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) organizers.

With IAW set to launch its eighth annual series of anti-Israel events on Canadian campuses March 5, organizations such as Hasbara Fellowships, Canadian Academics for Peace in the Middle East (CAPME), JerusalemOnlineU.com and Hillel of Greater Toronto are taking a proactive approach by presenting the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in a more accurate light.

Hasbara's Israel Peace Week (IPW), now in its third year, aims to counter anti-Israel propaganda with a simple message: "Israel wants peace and has demonstrated its willingness to make painful sacrifices for peace."

Hashem Hamdy, Hasbara's eastern Canada regional co-ordinator, said IPW will run alongside IAW, but he insists they have a different approach.

"Ours is positive," said Hamdy, an Arab Canadian. "We feel our message is positive and straightforward enough... We consider it to be so separate that we don't even call it a response to IAW... because it's our own campaign that we would do regardless."

Seventy-five campuses across North America, including nine Canadian schools, will host programs that promote Israel as a country dedicated to peace.

He said one of the programs being presented at Concordia University in Montreal is called Faces of Israel.

The project, led by the Israeli Ministry of Public Diplomacy and Diaspora Affairs, presents a diverse panel of Israelis, including former soldiers, Ethiopians, Muslims, Jews and Christians who will share their experiences of living in Israel.

"It'll put a human face on the issue and it shows that... Israel is a diverse and accepting place," Hamdy said.

At McGill University, McGill Friends of Israel will be hosting Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler.

Faith is not simple

From the editor's desk...

Last December and January, the aggressively violent and segregationist behaviour of a small sect of haredim in Beit Shemesh and Mea Shearim stunned most of us simultaneously with anger and shame.

How could it be, we asked ourselves, that the intolerant, anti-humane zealotry we so despise among extremist proponents of other religions, is also practised by our own co-religionists?

The Judaism they purport to "protect" is not the Judaism we want protected.

Of course, Judaism – the ancient-modern, profoundly life-affirming, ethical monotheism way of life and civilization that is both our magnificent inheritance and our hopeful bequest – needs no defence. And certainly not in this space. To fully explore its possibilities is to bring infinite, intergenerational connection to our finite lives.

But how propitious, nevertheless, given the earlier wide media coverage of an unrecognizably dark, ugly face of Judaism, that Koren Publishers Jerusalem has once again brought to the public a shining, thoughtful, inspiring and very beautiful representation of Jewish life through its recent publication of two seminal works, each featuring the teachings of the late Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik.

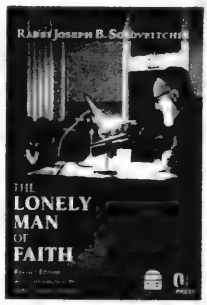
Rav Soloveitchik was and is known to a large segment of the Jewish world, not only among the modern Orthodox, science-and-Torah, Yeshiva University model of which he was and will likely always be considered the spiritual leader and pre-eminent teacher.

This space is far too small and my familiarity with Rav Soloveitchik's teachings too superficial to say more about him than a stone skipping across a napkin note of his achievements. But because he may not be known to a number of our readers, it is important that we call attention to these two new publications. They are that significant.

The Maggid Division of Koren, in cooperation with the Orthodox Union (OU) Press has re-released The Lonely Man of Faith, first published in 1965. The re-release contains additional material that expands, elaborates upon and enhances the original essay.

In the essay, Rav Soloveitchik discourses upon an essentially dual nature of our existence. As a starting point, he uses the two recitations of the creation of man and woman in the Book of Genesis. He adduces from the text two prototypical natures of human existence: one that conquers or masters the world and all its material contingencies, the other that struggles with the essential human loneliness striving for higher purpose and meaning.

In his helpful foreword, Rabbi Reuven Ziegler, points out that "Rabbi Soloveitchik does not wish to focus on a general, timeless theological issue, but instead to address the predicament of the contemporary man of faith, who, 'due to his peculiar position in our secular society… lives through a particularly difficult and agonizing crisis.'"



Confronting the world, playing a role in its advancement, contributing to the unfolding of God's aspirations for His creations is mankind's responsibility. But for the individual of faith, it inevitably entails struggle and an existential loneliness, which we must internalize and accept as being part of the condition of belief.

The Rav's ideas transcend a single religious orientation. They are universal in their application.

The second publication is a prayer book, a siddur, that incorporates Rabbi Soloveitchik's commentaries on prayer and worship, explanations of his personal practices and customs in prayer, and summaries of various of teachings that relate to prayer and related themes.

The Koren Mesorat Harav Siddur, Berman Family Edition, maintains the elegant esthetics that typify Koren Publishers Jerusalem. It has the lush, dignified features of the recently published Koren Sacks Siddur, including Rabbi Jonathan Sacks' translations of the prayers. In addition, and especially compelling, are introductory essays by scholars including Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein and Rabbi Sacks himself.

Rav Soloveitchik died on chol hamoed Pesach 19 years ago, in 1993. Who knows how he would react to the much fractured, intra-communal Jewish world today, what he would write today to heal those fractures, or about the many urgent, pressing, complexities and disunities of Jewish life?

In his introductory essay in the siddur, Rabbi Sacks wrote: "The life of faith is simple only to the simple. Those who have ventured deeper know that it is rarely easy or harmonious." He describes Rabbi Soloveitchik as "a thinker who lets us see our ancient tradition in a new light, like a poet describing an emotion we instantly recognize but never before were able to articulate."

Both of the Koren publications offer us the possibilities, with Rabbi Soloveitchik's guidance, of venturing deeper and of experiencing some of those new historical, poetic, spiritual and theological emotions.

Canadians increased trips to Israel in 2011

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israel's tourism minister wants to thank Canadians for their growing desire to see the sights and sounds of the Holy Land.

At a breakfast briefing hosted by Israel's Ministry of Tourism in Toronto last week, Stas Misezhnikov enlightened an audience of diplomats, media and Canadian tour operators about the wonders of Israel as a premium travel destination.

Misezhnikov praised Canadians for their interest in his country, noting that of all western travellers, only Canadians increased their visits to Israel in the period from January 2010 to January 2011.

"Israel increased its Canadian tourists by three per cent" last year, he said.

He said the unfortunate reality is that many would-be travellers only know the country through the lens of its conflict with the Palestinians and neighbouring Arab countries, and therefore think it's a dangerous place to visit.

"Moses brought us to a great land, but he chose a lousy neighbourhood," Misezhnikov quipped to reporters.

When international travellers decide where they're going to go, they often look at Israel and think it's another unstable Arab country.

"They often don't know where Israel ends" and where countries such as Egypt, Lebanon and Syria begin, he said.

Add to that the recent turmoil in Egypt, which has effectively choked off all day-trip excursions by Egyptians to Israel's southern resorts in and around Eilat. As a result, Israel now must find alternative ways to generate tourism and help the sector, Misezhnikov said.

Stas Misezhnikov

To that end, he said Israel is considering lowering municipal and water taxation rates on hotel operators, and it's offering grants to hoteliers worth 20 per cent of the cost of building a hotel in Israel. That number increases to 28 per cent for hotels built in Jerusalem.

Misezhnikov said Israel's tourism industry centres on the Holy City, but his ministry is also playing up the multiple wonders of the country.

"We sell Israel as [not only] a religious, historic and cultural experience, but also as a [destination] for leisure activities like going to the beach... the night life of Tel Aviv or resorts in Eilat," he said.

Misezhnikov said his ministry has also been pushing for more collaboration with the Palestinian Authority on tourism, but so far with little success.

He said he's told the Palestinians that for every three tourists that come to Israel, two would want to visit the West Bank and experience Palestinian culture as well. He said there's economic gain to be had for both Israelis and Palestinians if they can work together on tourism.

He believes Israelis and Palestinians can begin to solve their conflict by establishing "new trust via tourism success."

"I'm trying to convince them to co-promote tourism to the region. But the PA is ignoring my calls. It's a pity, because this could be a win-win," he said.

Despite this, in January, a joint Israeli-Palestinian eco-project was launched between Jenin in the West Bank and the Gilboa regional council to create a 148-acre recreational site along the Kishon River.

Israel is also planning big changes to the Dead Sea region.

Misezhnikov said his ministry intends to develop the area over the next five years and has committed 850 million shekels ($226 million) to the project. Israel will build malls, hotels, restaurants and other tourist attractions to further boost the Dead Sea as a travel destination.

"In five years, you won't recognize the [Dead Sea] region," he predicted.

Asked whether his ministry is also investing money to halt the Dead Sea's erosion at the lowest point on Earth – its northern basin is said to be shrinking at an alarming one metre per year – Misezhnikov said part of the development money will fund research into how best to save the sea from evaporation.

Other infrastructural improvements are being planned that will help grow the Israeli economy, tourism included.

The proposed construction of a railway from Tel Aviv to Eilat is currently being debated in the Knesset. A non-stop train from Tel Aviv to Eilat would take only two hours, compared to five hours by car.

The government also plans to build an international airport near Eilat, which would increase tourist access to the Red Sea resort.

May proclaimed Jewish Heritage Month

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

It's official. May is now Jewish Heritage Month in Ontario.

Bill 17, the Jewish Heritage Month Act, put forward in October last year by Eglinton-Lawrence Liberal MPP Mike Colle and co-sponsored by Thornhill Conservative MPP Peter Shurman and High-Park New Democrat MPP for Cheri DiNovo, passed unanimously in the provincial legislature Feb. 23.

Colle said he wanted to "honour the significant achievements of Jewish Canadians across Ontario."

Mike Colle

The act is the first of its kind to become law in Canada. Ontario is home to more than 200,000 Jews, making it the province with the largest Jewish demographic. There are an estimated 360,000 Jews in Canada.

"Jewish Heritage Month is an opportunity to remember, celebrate and educate future generations about the inspirational role that Jewish Canadians have played, and continue to play, in communities across Ontario," the act proclaims.

Speaking to The CJN the day after his bill passed, Colle said the Jewish community and its effects on the growth of Ontario are not discussed enough.

"Besides the list of incredible Jewish individuals in the province's history… the legacy we need to pay attention to is the dogged determination [of Jews] to fight for social and human rights. That advocacy has left an indelible mark on the province," he said.

Colle said May was chosen because it is "a significant month for the Jewish Canadian community. Various Jewish artistic and cultural events such as the UJA Walk for Israel, Toronto Jewish Film Festival and Jewish Music Week occur in May. Holocaust Remembrance Day and Israeli Independence Day also frequently occur in May."

He added its inspiration stemmed from seeing the Italian Heritage Month Act receive royal assent in 2010.

Bill 17 had widespread support among the Jewish community, including endorsements from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, B'nai Brith Canada, the National Congress of Italian Canadians – Toronto District, the London Jewish Federation, the Ontario Jewish Archives and the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada.

In a statement, David Spiro, CIJA's Greater Toronto co-chair, commended Queen's Park for enacting the law.

"For more than two centuries, the Jewish community has worked side by side with Ontarians from all backgrounds to help build one of the greatest places in the world to raise a family," he said.

"Just as Jewish Heritage Month offers an opportunity to reflect on our past, it serves as a reminder for all in our province to continue building on our collective achievements for the benefit of the next generation of Ontarians."

Shurman called the bill's passage a "great day" for the Jewish community.

Now that it's law, the province and community are gearing up to celebrate this May in some form or fashion.

In a statement, Ted Sokolsky and Elizabeth Wolfe, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's president and CEO and board chair, respectively, praised the new law.

"Building and contributing to community and to society has always been a top priority for Jews since their arrival in Canada, and this honour recognizes those contributions as we continue to add to the diverse multicultural mosaic that has made Ontario a place envied by many around the world," they said.

"This announcement will call for an extra celebration at this year's UJA Walk with Israel, which for 45 years has taken place in May."

A spokesperson for Premier Dalton McGuinty said it was too soon to tell what the province would do to recognize the newly created heritage month, but the premier is looking forward to "continued work and involvement with the Jewish community."

However, Colle said McGuinty charged him with planning any event he wants and that the premier said "he'd be there whatever we decide to do."

Colle and fellow MPP Eric Hoskins, the minister of citizenship and immigration, will co-host an event in May at Beth Torah Congregation to mark the new law.

It will be a night of "glorious celebration, guest speakers, music, recitals and food," Colle said.

Principles and values, too

In her column last week, The CJN's Jean Gerber pointedly reminded us that the current agitated public debate regarding possible adjustments to Old Age Security (OAS) payments has been devoid of any reference to underlying societal values and principles.

"For them [the media and government officials] it's all about the money. Is it? Should it be?" Gerber asked. "Are we thinking about the right questions? Or is it easier to just think about the cost, without acknowledging that we don't even have the right questions?"

To be fair, the government's public pronouncements on the subject have indeed paid homage to the older generations of Canadians. In her address last week to Canadian Club of Toronto, Human Resources Minister Diane Finley, expressly acknowledged the need to provide for "the generation that built this country." She also affirmed that Canadian seniors currently collecting benefits would not be affected by future changes to the OAS.

But it was also the case that the minister took pains to direct the key message of her comments to younger Canadians. "In a speech to Toronto's Canadian Club, Ms. Finley singled out a table of students," the Globe and Mail reported.

And the nub of her message was that the future cost of the OAS would be a burden to them. "The total cost of benefits will be increasingly unsustainable for tomorrow's workers and taxpayers. And it's the next generation of Canadians who will have to shoulder the burden," she said.

To be sure, the affordability of OAS is a vital concern for the government. Indeed, it would be negligent, if not reckless, were the government not to plan for the future.

But in formulating that plan, the government must be reminded, as Gerber and so many others plead, that the debate must be more than exclusively economic and actuarial. The debate must also be about ethics, responsibilities, values and principles.

Since the very first moments when families gathered around a hearth or sat together at a dinner table, it has always been the lot of one generation to shoulder burdens for the other. Going off to war, raising children, tending to parents and caring for the needy – the poor, the indigent, the infirm, or in biblical terms, the widow, the orphan and the stranger – are the burdens that we carry by virtue of our humanity, by virtue of the fact that we have chosen to live together, to build a society together in a civil, mutually respectful and dignified manner.

Especially in relation to foreign policy and international relations, we have seen the government apply principles and core values in the settling of public policy.

We expect and look forward to the government doing the very same when it formulates its policies on OAS.

JDC helps survivors in former Soviet Union

In my article "The indigent survivor: a global emergency" (Jan. 12), I drew attention to the plight of survivors living in poverty in the former Soviet Union (FSU). Further research has revealed that I provided an incomplete picture of the situation and did not clarify the distinction between survivors (Nazi victims) and other Jewish elderly living in poverty (non-Nazi victims).

An overall picture of the precarious lives the elderly poor lead in the former Soviet Union is gained through an appreciation of the scale and scope of the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) operation. In the former Soviet Union, the organization has a caseload of 164,000, consisting of a first tier of about 82,000 survivors (Nazi victims) and a second tier equal in number, of non-Nazi victims. Although Nazi victims qualify for additional assistance from the Jewish Material Claims Conference Against Germany, it still leaves them mired in poverty, but they are the better-off ones! Imagine the situation of non-Nazi victims! A third tier of destitution, however, exists beyond the reach of the JDC. Severely curtailed by budgetary constraints, the organization is forced to turn away an estimated 60,000 indigent elderly who can't afford a basic diet, let alone medicines.

These bubbies and zaides, Nazi victims and non-Nazi victims alike, deserve better! JDC is on the front line with a distinguished record of serving the Jewish People. It continues to burnish its reputation at times like these when a winter of exceptional hardship in the former Soviet Union has left many elderly poor with additional needs.

Canada's rabbi

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut understood the "big picture" and lived his life accordingly ("We were blessed he was in our midst," Feb. 16). He was a man forged by the forces of the Holocaust, the disciplines of his training as a lawyer and the love of God. Rabbi Plaut had seen the devastation of Nazi Germany, not only on the Jews but on the German people. He fought for human rights and freedoms for all on a global scale. He was a man driven by his studies of the Torah and its compelling teaching that learning is not enough. We must do. He understood Proverbs 114:34: "Righteousness exalts a nation, but sin is a reproach of any people." He loved Canada and wanted the blessings of God to rest upon it. His dreams and goals extended far beyond his own Jewish community. He was Canada's rabbi and, in many cases, Canada's conscience.

Through his scholarship, he has given to Reform Judaism a refreshing view of the God that he loved and served. His goal was to draw the individual into an intense personal study of the Scriptures and how they should affect their lives. His legacy to all of us who follow in the pathways of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob will have an impact for generations. I stand erect as a Christian, head bowed in respect, and thank my God for the life of such a man as Rabbi Plaut.

Fight anti-Zionism with written word

The annual hate fest Israeli Apartheid Week will soon take place on North American campuses ("Journal seeks to make Jewish thought accessible," Feb. 16). Why not use the next edition of the University of Toronto Journal of Jewish Thought to deal with today's most important subject, that of countering Israel delegitimization at universities? The journal and all other Jewish academic journals ought to deal with the antisemitic, anti-Zionist programs at North American universities. While we cannot compete with the millions donated by oil-rich countries to universities, we can fight with the only tool available to us: the written word.

As total madness has captured academia, the media and other elites in the western world, contaminating the minds of uninformed youths – the leaders and voters of generations to come – it is our duty to enlighten them with the truth. There is ample material available to remind everyone of the crucial historical events and legal documents that attest to the rights of the Jewish People to the Land of Israel, notwithstanding the deniers' vociferous voices.

Cruel and questionable deterrence

Don Futterman
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

An estimated 50,000 African refugees, mostly from Eritrea and Sudan, have snuck into Israel through Sinai over the past five years. They tend to concentrate in areas such as south Tel Aviv, taking jobs away from the poorest of Israelis, and increasing public disorder. Their arrival has changed the complexion of entire neighbourhoods and given locals the feeling they have been invaded, leading Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai to demand that the prime minister save his city.

The problem is not unique to Israel –waves of impoverished illegals challenge many western countries – but Israel's size and Jewish character make it a special case.

As Jews, many of us identify with the suffering of refugees fleeing persecution, and even with those who are primarily seeking economic opportunity. When the gates of America or Palestine were open, Jews flooded through, struggled and thrived – or at least, survived. When the gates were locked, we were killed. But we also know that Israel is too small to absorb the suffering masses of another continent.

Unfortunately, intractable dilemmas like this bring out the worst in governments, and Prime Minister Netanyahu's $165-million deterrent policy, scheduled for Knesset ratification next week, is based on criminalizing desperate and largely helpless people.

Rights organizations claim the vast majority of African refugees are legitimate asylum seekers, escaping political persecution, war or genocide. But Israel grants refugee status to almost nobody and does not even examine the cases of Sudanese and Eritreans. The government maintains that most African illegal immigrants are not political refugees, but rather migrant workers seeking to improve their economic prospects. Because this argument lacks sufficient emotional charge, the government frames the discourse in terms of threats, playing off the public's fears.

Nomenclature matters and labelling the refugees as illegal work infiltrators has threatening associations, particularly since the new policy is based on legislation to counter the infiltration into Israel of Arab terrorists intent on murder, from hostile neighbouring countries.

The funding approved by the government last week is intended to finance a 240-kilometre fence along Israel's Sinai border with Egypt. But it will also go to building the largest detention facility for illegal immigrants in the world, run by Israel's Prison Service, and increase maximum detention time from 60 days to three years. If it is determined that detainees – and this includes children – are from an area considered hostile to Israel, such as parts of Sudan where Al Qaeda is active, they will never be eligible for release, in which case we might as well just call it a prison.

Employers of illegal immigrants will be subject to fines up to 75,000 shekels (about $20,000 Cdn) and face closure of their business. In fact, Israelis helping illegal immigrants in any way could face imprisonment for up to five years. This provision was seen as so extreme that the Knesset interior committee asked to limit liability only to citizens who assist illegals caught engaging in criminal or terrorist activity.

The Jewish public is much more conflicted than the government. In the spirit that once moved us to welcome several hundred Vietnamese boat people, health professionals and other volunteers work alongside organizations like the Hotline for Migrant Workers and the Association for Civil Rights in Israel to help the refugees. Tel Aviv's Bialik Rogozin School, the subject of last year's Oscar winner for best documentary, provides children of foreign workers and illegal refugees with top-flight education.

While a fence may slow things down, and we have every right to police our borders, the other draconian measures will have questionable deterrent value. According to documentation, refugees have been robbed, tortured, raped, held captive to extort ransoms of up to $30,000 per person from family members, trafficked as labour or sex slaves and, in some cases, had their organs harvested for sale – all by the smugglers they pay to lead them through Sinai. If they continue to arrive despite these horrors, is long-term detention likely to scare them off?

There are no great options and probably no way to completely stop the immigration. History suggests that significant numbers of refugees go home when conditions allow, but this can take years. Many refugees will likely be here for an extended period, and we ought to figure out how to absorb them for the time being.

According to the most recent UN statistics available, in 2009 almost 84 per cent of Eritrean and close to 64 per cent of Sudanese asylum seekers worldwide were accorded refugee status. These figures may be what has scared our government off from even considering granting these people official refugee status, but they can hardly justify such an approach. In 2010, only six out of 3,366 applications for asylum were approved – far less than one per cent. We should establish reasonable standards to determine refugee status and begin checking the Sudanese and Eritrean illegal immigrants.

First, instead of the government's plan, we have to decriminalize the debate, since almost no one involved is a criminal, ratchet down the incitement and take the prisons authority out of the picture. We should launch a public discourse about our moral obligations regarding refugees and the limits of our capacity, as a small, and mostly Jewish, state.

Refugee petitions against deportation

Dana Weiler-Polak
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A petition filed recently in court arguing against the deportation of a refugee to Eritrea alleges that the state deceives the courts in telling them Eritrean refugees deported to Ethiopia are in no danger, while the authorities know this puts the migrants' lives at risk.

According to the petitioner's lawyer, Omer Shatz, of the human rights group Anu Plitim, "the authorities know the refugees' lives are in danger – they are imprisoned as soon as they land at the airport [in Ethiopia] – but they repeatedly hide it from the courts." The petitioner, Prau Isho Hagos, is an Eritrean.

Petah Tikva District Court Judge Avraham Yaakov said at a hearing on Hagos' petition that the state's contradictory statements were tantamount to "gambling with human life."

Hagos, 24, migrated with his family to Ethiopia after the war with Eritrea that ended over a decade ago. In Ethiopia, his mother, brother and sister were murdered and the family's house was burned down. Hagos and his father and brother fled to Sudan.

When he entered Israel in 2009, Egyptian soldiers shot his brother and his pregnant wife near the border. Hagos, who was injured in the incident, was arrested in Israel and detained at the Saharonim and Givon prisons for two years.

He told the authorities he was Eritrean and therefore entitled to protection from deportation. But the Population and Immigration Authority insisted he was Ethiopian, a status enabling immediate deportation. Hagos produced documents proving his nationality, as required. The authority finally agreed he had been born in Eritrea, but argued he was also Ethiopian and therefore part of a group classified as "Ethiopians of Eritrean origin" or "mixed Ethiopians." Israel has special classifications known as "Ethiopians of Eritrean origin" and "mixed Ethiopians."

But an official from the Ethiopian consulate met Hagos in custody and refused to grant him Ethiopian papers, claiming he was not Ethiopian.

The prosecution argued that the decision to deport Hagos was reasonable because he could not prove he was Eritrean and "failed to prove he did not have Ethiopian nationality."

The state told the court last year that "mixed Ethiopians were in no danger if they were deported to Ethiopia. There is no evidence the Ethiopian authorities harassed or discriminated against people who had stayed in Eritrea or who consider themselves partly Eritrean."

But later that month Ravit Topol of the Interior Ministry's refugee status determination unit told the ministry's advisory committee on refugees that Ethiopia was not safe for "mixed Ethiopians." She also said the authorities didn't know what happened to refugees on their return to Ethiopia. "They are all in danger of persecution," she said.

The refugee status determination unit asked for a report on the situation in Ethiopia but has yet to receive it, she said.

Purim tech: the good, the bad and the cyber

Happy i-Purim! With apps on my phone that can recite the Megillah, show me the text, or drown out the name of the nefarious villain, I'm set. Who needs a scroll, a book or a gragger? For that matter, who needs community? I can video into a cyber-minyan, or watch one on YouTube.

And while doing that, I can pull up some rabbinic commentaries, along with blogs offering contemporary takes on the ancient story. Imagine the travails of our long-ago ancestors, crowding around the precious few handwritten documents, or our not-so-long-ago ancestors, lugging books and scheduling travel to be near a shul when Purim comes around.

If you follow articles and blogs about Jewish cyber resources, you know what I mean. In the digitized world, we carry our connections and values, Jewish or otherwise, everywhere. We live in a world no less miraculous than that of Shushan around the 14th and 15th days of the month of Adar so many centuries ago.

But in the spirit of Purim, I feel compelled to turn this paean to technology on its head. After all, our sages urge us to drink to the point of ad delo yada – not knowing – the difference between Mordecai and Haman. Or, put differently, between the good guy and the bad guy, or the good and the bad.

And that, I believe, is where we are with the miracle of technology.

Don't misunderstand. I'm not a Luddite. I embrace technology as much as the next guy – in fact, even more than the next guy, especially if the next guy is my husband. We have twice as many computers as people at home, and my phone is way smarter than I am. I Google, doodle and tweet. I upload, download, and sync with the clouds, and cavort in the blogosphere.

And yet.

The wonderful Jewish American writer and poet Marge Piercy wrote a marvellous science fiction novel, He, She, and It, that grapples with the implications of technological advances and artificial intelligence through the prism of a futuristic Jewish community and the development of a postmodern golem. No longer separate from the electronic devices that connect them to vast storehouses of knowledge and to one another, folks plug bodily into computers. They experience and define themselves through technology and cyberspace. The self and the chip become almost inseparable.

Oh, brave new world!

The thing about science fiction writing, though, is that it projects us into the future in order to examine problems of the present. And one issue that Piercy's novel foregrounds is our relationship to powerful technology – the good and the bad.

We professors see it in our classes and in our research. Want more information? Students pull it up instantly on their laptops and smartphones. Research that once took laborious hours in distant archives happens at home, instantaneously on our screens. But can we shut it off?

Sara R. Horowitz

in Toronto

Social interactions these days always involve more guests than you bargain for – hello Mr. Droid and Ms. BBerry. As for classroom dynamics, even though I tell my students to turn off anything that rings, vibrates or lights up during seminar discussions, our community of learning is quickly unravelled by the apparently irresistible pull of Facebook, messaging, e-mail, cyber-shopping and even Netflix. One student who texted all through the screening of a documentary film about the Holocaust later apologized for her "addiction." I think she got it right – it is an addiction of sorts. And like all addictions, it changes the addict in ways that the addict cannot see.

Recently, a professors' listserv was occupied for days about how to handle the "problem of technology" in our classes. And, as my colleague Eric Lawee recently observed, the pedagogic challenges are the least of the issues. Tech use starts young. How does it affect social skills, sensitivity, tenacity, the ability to focus, to hold onto and think through matters longer that 140-character tweets and more complex than "OMG ur my BFF LOL"?

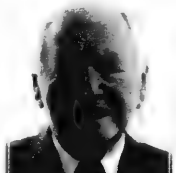
Purim is easy. Even if we momentarily lose track of the good and bad guys, we sober up and things fall back into their proper categories. But in our evolving digital world, the good and bad can't be so easily separated.

Judaism for all

My parents weren't religious, yet they were proud members of the Jewish People, as were most of their contemporaries in pre-1939 Poland. The day World War II broke out and the Germans invaded the country, we fled, with those who accurately sensed that the Nazis were bent on exterminating all Jews, whether religious or not.

When after the war we ended up in Sweden, the Jewish community there, like in other Scandinavian countries, described itself as the "Mosaic" congregation, implying that Judaism was the religion of Moses and the Jews weren't really a people. Like other newcomers, we were baffled.

The tension between Judaism as faith and Jews as a people has resurfaced of late. In his book The Invention of the Jewish People, the Israeli historian Shlomo Sands insists that Judaism has never been anything but a religion. He has an anti-Zionist agenda that argues that, as there's no Jewish People, Jews have no right to claim Israel as their own.



Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

By contrast, the American Jewish historian Leora Batnitzky shows in her book, How Judaism Became a Religion, that there has always been a Jewish People. She maintains that turning Judaism into a faith community was a modern ploy to enable Jews to claim civic equality in the countries in which they lived.

"Mosaic" may thus have been a convenient though inappropriate description of Judaism in a misguided attempt to make it correspond to other religions.

Batnitzky's agenda is to find a place within Judaism for self-proclaimed secular Jews. In the early stages of Jewish emancipation, to be secular in the western Diaspora came to express the ambition to assimilate into the surrounding culture. In Israel, as in eastern Europe, secularism has always affirmed Judaism as a legitimate expression of the people's collective identity.

Though today about half of Israelis describe themselves as secular, some 80 per cent say they believe in God thus affirming – in the terminology of Mordecai Kaplan, the founder of Reconstructionism – that Judaism is a religious civilization that's neither Mosaic nor Godless.

Religion now becomes primarily a personal commitment to God, while Jews are bound to each other as members of the same people with Israel as its historic homeland. Because of the influence that the Jewish state now has over world Jewry, Batnitzky's view is being increasingly affirmed. To describe us as adherents of the Mosaic faith has become unacceptable; indeed, the communities in Scandinavia have dropped the term in favour of "Jewish."

One of the manifestations in Israel of Batnitzky's contention is the emergence of secular yeshivot. While Jews have usually associated the yeshiva with a religious, often Orthodox, orientation, these new yeshivot affirm that there's much more to Judaism than religion.

Their curriculum includes Talmud, Midrash and Codes, like in the traditional counterparts, but they also study Bible and ancient and modern Jewish thinkers, as well as contemporary Hebrew writers. All are seen as part of the cultural and spiritual heritage of the Jewish People.

The aridity of the once allegedly widespread Israeli indifference to religion on the one hand and current haredi fanaticism on the other has prompted sensitive women and men to delve deeper into Jewish sources in search of roots, meaning and purpose.

Traditional yeshivot ordain rabbis, but that isn't the aim of the secular yeshiva. Its students are exposed to Torah l'shma, learning for the sake of learning and spiritual enrichment, not for professional advancement.

Of late, however, some such places now authorize women and men to function not as rabbis but as officiants at life-cycle events to respond to the public demand for rituals based on traditional practices yet without the benefit of clergy.

Though this new trend may not become the normative Judaism of tomorrow, it's attracting Jews in Israel and abroad. Secular congregations now exist in many countries, including Canada.

I belong to the world of organized religion and am very happy to be a Reform rabbi. Originally, it may have been my way of rebelling against the spiritual turmoil in which I was reared; today, it's my way of being.

Nevertheless, I view recent attempts to affirm ostensibly secular Jewish learning and traditional Jewish practices as yet another, most welcome, way of making Judaism accessible to all. To separate faith from Jewish Peoplehood is artificial and misleading. A growing number of Jews have come to realize it. They deserve our support.

She changed the crime-novel genre

V.I. Warshawski is one tough lady, an edgy private investigator in Chicago who uses her brains as well as her fists.

She's a problem solver, but has been known to break into offices in search of clues. She appreciates fine clothes, drinks Johnny Walker Black Label whisky, hums operatic arias and enjoys an active sex life.

Warshawski, a figment of Sara Paretsky's restless imagination, is the main character in her bestselling detective novel series, the first of which, Indemnity Only, was published 30 years ago.

"She's much braver and more physically fit than me," confessed her creator, a fairly tall, stylish, silver-haired woman in her mid-60s who was recently in Toronto to promote Breakdown, her 15th V.I. Warshawski novel. Brimming with suspense and laced with razor-sharp wit, it is set against the backdrop of contemporary politics and pop culture.

By creating Warshawski, Paretsky, a feminist, revolutionized the crime novel genre, shattering clichés about women fostered by male writers running the gamut from Raymond Chandler to Rex Stout. "I wanted to counter these stereotypes," explained Paretsky in an interview. "This is what really motivated me."

In her memoirs, Writing in an Age of Silence, published in 2007, Paretsky elaborated on this point.

"I wanted to create a woman who would turn the tables on the dominant view of women in fiction and in society. The more I read, the more I realized that a woman's moral character was determined by her sexuality. If she were chaste, she was good, but helpless, unable to act. If she had sex, she could act, but she could perform only evil deeds."

To Paretsky, a woman's place in hard-boiled detective novels was irretrievably fixed. "Women could be vamps or virgins. These stereotypes defined women in 20th-century crime fiction."

Rebelling against traditional notions about women, Paretsky set about transforming the image of women in the popular genre.

She may be the best-educated crime fiction writer who has ever lived, holding a PhD in American history and a postgraduate degree in business administration, both earned from the University of Chicago.

Paretsky's education has proved useful. "It's given me a framework to understand contemporary events in a historical context and maybe made my work richer." And, she added, her rigorous academic training has helped her in research.

Paretsky, whose husband is a physicist at the University of Chicago, was a marketing manager in the financial services industry when she produced the first V.I. Warshawski novel. "I was trying to create a woman who was a person, not an angel or a monster."

She clung to her day job after writing the first three Warshawski novels, but with the success of Deadlock (1984) and Killing Orders (1985), she felt confident enough to quit and strike out on her own.

She has never looked back. "I'm able to support myself with my writing," said Paretsky, who won last year's coveted Mystery Writers of America's Master Award. "I feel very fortunate, especially in this lagging economy."

Left-of-centre politically, she infuses her novels with a passion for social justice. "There are things going on around me," she noted. But Paretsky does not use her novels as platform for her views.

However, she is not averse to tackling current political or social issues.

In Bitter Medicine, her fourth novel, she took on the medical profession. In her next novel, Blood Shot, she embraced the environmental movement while blasting chemical companies. And in Guardian Angel, readers accompanied her into the world of high finance.

When she sits down to compose a new novel, she usually starts with a crime. "I play around with it until I have characters who come to life. I do a lot of stopping and starting. I'm always throwing out material."

V.I. Warshawski is neither Jewish nor Polish. "She identifies herself as an American," said Paretsky, who considers herself Jewish and American.

Paretsky was born in Ames, Iowa, in the American heartland, on June 8, 1947, as her father, a New Yorker, was completing a PhD in bacteriology at Iowa State College. Later, he taught at the University of Kansas in Lawrence, where Paretsky was raised.

His family arrived in the United States from Lithuania in the early 20th century, after his grandfather was murdered in a pogrom near Vilna in 1908. Family members who missed the opportunity to settle in the United States or Palestine before World War II perished in the Holocaust. She was named after a grandmother who was killed during that period.

Not surprisingly, Paretsky's newest novel is peppered with references to the Nazi occupation of Vilna. "I keep revisiting these themes," she said. "The Holocaust weighs on me."

Sara Paretsky

Paretsky's mother, a librarian who never finished an advanced degree in science, was descended from British and Dutch Protestants who arrived in America in the 17th century.

Paretsky's highly literate parents were devoted to the written word. Her father could read German, Yidddish and Greek. Her mother, a natural storyteller with a dreamy personality, was drawn to fiction and history. "I grew up in a household of readers," she recalled.

In Lawrence, a white-bread Anglo town with a handful of Jews where ethnocentrism was the norm, Paretsky was something of an oddity.

Although she was never directly the victim of antisemitism, she felt rather isolated. "There were a few ugly incidents. But our appliance repair man didn't charge us for a job because he thought Jews were the children of God."

Her brother, Jeremy – a gifted linguist who converted to Christianity and is now a Dominican priest and professor at the University of California – taught Paretsky how to read. "I followed him around like a pet duckling."

In high school, Paretsky was fortunate enough to have been taught by an English teacher who appreciated her talents as a budding novelist. "He encouraged me to write and kept me writing. Without him, I might have quit."

At 20, she began thinking seriously of becoming a writer, but after working as a community organizer in Chicago during the 1966 race riots, an experience that broadened her horizons, she decided to continue her education.

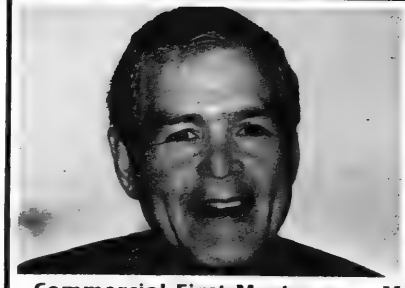
Having majored in political science at the University of Kansas, she switched course, finishing a doctorate dissertation titled The Breakdown of Moral Philosophy in New England Before the Civil War.

Since teaching positions in university history departments were scarce when she graduated, Paretsky had to "retool" herself. She took a degree in business.

Long before Barack Obama was elected president and was still an obscure Illinois state senator, Paretsky worked with him on the board of an organization dedicated to improving the lot of mentally ill homeless people. "He was really smart and exuded charisma. I wrote a letter urging him to run for the U.S. Senate."

Although she has no idea how many more V.I. Warshawski novels will flow from her pen, she is sanguine. "I hope my brain keeps working," said Paretsky, who has already started the research for her next novel.

Romspen is the best financial decision I have ever made.



I am wary of investment tips. Most are a recipe for losing money. But investing with Romspen is absolutely the best investment decision I ever made. In fact, I have reinvested many times over the years.

Don't confuse Romspen with the scammers. Romspen is not too good to be true. It is a fund of first mortgages in Canada that is managed by experienced and fine people. It works because they know what they are doing. Their excellent reputation with both investors and borrowers is well deserved.

Israel-hatred on campus seen as threat to existence

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The growing phenomenon of Israel-hatred on American university campuses poses a threat to Israel's very existence, claims the author of a new book on the subject.

Calling the "intellectual jihad" against Israel part and parcel of a wider "stealth campaign" aimed at western culture, values and political ideology, Richard Cravatts charged that this "unrelenting assault" on Israel places Israel at real risk.

Cravatts, a faculty member of the Simmons School of Management in Boston, makes these accusations in Genocidal Liberalism: The University's Jihad Against Israel & Jews, published by the David Horowitz Freedom Center in Sherman Oaks, Calif., a group associated with conservative causes.

In an interview, Cravatts said that Israel's detractors on campus want to delegitimize it by transforming it into a pariah state whose racism, brutality and militarism should no longer be tolerated.

If they succeed in changing Israel's image into that of a loathsome state, the political cost of supporting Israel may be so onerous that it "may well go unprotected when it is put at existential risk by enemies who wish its elimination," said Cravatts, who was in Toronto late last month.

According to Cravatts, anti-Israel enmity has become "a covert and surrogate form" of antisemitism.

Typically, haters of Israel deny Israeli Jews the right of self-determination by claiming that Israel is a racist entity, apply double standards to it, use classic antisemitic symbols and images to define it, compare it to Nazi Germany and hold Jews collectively responsible for Israel's actions.

"So when Israel's campus enemies disingenuously claim that they are merely critiquing its policies, while actually demonizing, delegitimizing and slandering it, they often cross the line into actual antisemitic rhetoric and thought."

Prior to the Six Day War, Israel was admired for its democracy and pluck and could count on the liberal left for support and an ideological nod of approval, he noted.

But after its post-1967 rise as a military and economic power, Israel was increasingly regarded in a far different light. "Many of Israel's sympathizers began to lose their affection for Israel and began conflating their negative view of the United States, capitalism and imperialism with the Jewish state," he observed.

Richard Cravatts

This trend manifested itself as Israel's Arab foes waged a successful propaganda war against it.

At universities, Israel was lambasted and targeted as two watchwords of higher education, diversity and multiculturalism, came into vogue, he said.

"Diversity has seen university administrations bending over backwards to accommodate the sensitivities of minorities and perceived victims of the majority culture, usually at the expense of fairness and rationality.

"Multiculturalism has brought with it a type of moral relativism in which every country or victim group is equal, regardless of what vagaries, weaknesses or fundamental evil may underpin its social structure."

In his view, several other factors have played into the anti-Israel discourse. The notion of "social justice" has been conflated with the victims of unjust western societies and with imperialist and capitalistic nations such as the United States and Israel.

Cravatts added the cult of "Palestinianism" has been fed into this narrative. He defined Palestinianism as an obsession with achieving Palestinian statehood while spewing animus at Israel.

To the academic left, Israel's existence is not about self-determination for the Jewish people, but about greed, globalism, colonialism, exploitation and undeserved political and economic might.

Cravatts said that Israel's image as a racist state was fostered by two events – the 1975 United Nations' proclamation equating Zionism with racism, which was retracted, and the second Palestinian uprising, which erupted in September 2000.

Branding these critics hypocritical, he said they denounce Israel as a criminal state but regularly excuse or apologize for "genocidal Arab terrorism" as an "acceptable and inevitable result of a weak people, the Palestinians, suffering under western oppression and the legacy of imperialism." Further, they accept Arab violence because it is deemed to be the fault of the strong nations that have subjugated them.

Universities in California are at the centre of this form of Israel bashing, he said.

And Jewish academics play a role in this phenomenon, he noted, singling out Joel Beinin of Stanford University, Jennifer Loewenstein of the University of Wisconsin, Sara Roy of Harvard University and Marc Ellis of Baylor University, among others.

To Cravats, the "paradigmatic libeler" is Norman Finkelstein, the son of Holocaust survivors and formerly of DePaul University.

Some Middle East studies departments, funded in part by Arab states, have become havens for antipathy to Israel, he said, citing Columbia University and Georgetown University.

Cravatts is less than surprised that Israel has become an object of admiration in conservative rather than liberal circles.

"Liberals in the West, having expressed reverence for Third World victims and support for Palestinianism, have made Israel the focus of their rage against what they perceive to be its colonial, oppressive, racist and militaristic character. Conservatives feel they are in battle to protect western values, culture and the Judeo-Christian tradition now threatened by radical Islam and the jihad against western democracies in general and against Israel in particular."

Although many conservatives do not back Israel out of any fondness, they understand that it is essentially "the canary in the mineshaft of western civilization," said Cravatts, who supports a two-state solution.

Beth Tzedec mounts major Purim Shpiel

Compiled by CJN Staff

For the seventh year in a row, Beth Tzedec Congregation is producing a full-scale musical theatre production for the greater Toronto community, and this year it's bigger than ever.

Megillah Mia: The Scandinavian Purim features the familiar melodies of Abba, but beyond that, everything about the production is original.

The play, written by the dynamic husband-wife team of Simon and Aliza Spiro, sets the story of Purim up north in the land of Vikings, trolls and Swedish meatballs.

"We wanted to use the music of Abba, because Mamma Mia is so popular today with kids and their parents," said Simon, Beth Tzedec's cantor, who is creating new orchestrations and conducting the 15-piece professional orchestra (whose members, coincidentally, played in the pit for Mamma Mia during its Toronto run).

"Since Abba is from Sweden, we thought it would be more whimsical if we threw in everything that people associate with Scandinavia."

That includes a Viking King, a Swedish chef and a storyteller named Hans Jewish Anderson. The lyrics were written by Aliza, an award-winning American songwriter, and the two will direct and oversee the cast and crew of more than 100 Beth Tzedec congregants and staff.

Over the years, each new production has become more sophisticated than the last.

The sets in the very first show were painted bed sheets, and the inexperienced actors used auto-cue to ensure the flow of the story.

Now, after seven years, the stage has expanded, sets are created by one of Toronto's leading theatre designers, there's state-of-the-art lighting, and most of the actors have developed a polish that belies their amateur status.

Costume consultants, a dance captain and choreographer, front-of-house managers and an enormous crowd of volunteers round out the team that helps bring this production to the community.

The audience has expanded, as well. In addition to public shows, Megillah Mia will have a private performance that the Masorti Organization will use as a fundraising event, and there will be special daytime performance for school groups and senior centres.

"It's very exciting to see 500 middle schoolers watch the Purim story come to life, albeit in a ridiculous setting," Aliza said. "But that's what makes it such fun – they not only see the story of Esther, but they understand that Purim is a holiday of revelry and ridiculousness."

Megillah Mia: The Scandinavian Purim is playing at Beth Tzedec from March 7 – 11. Tickets are available at 416-781-3511. For more information, contact Aliza Spiro at alizasara@aol.com.

Butterfly Project recalls kids killed in Shoah

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When Brenda Lass, an arts specialist at Baycrest's Donald and Elaine Rafelman Creative Arts Studio, read about Holocaust Museum Houston's Butterfly Project, she wanted to help out.

Inspired by the poem The Butterfly by Pavel Friedman, who perished in Auschwitz in 1944 (see sidebar), the museum is collecting 1.5 million handmade butterflies, to commemorate the 1.5 million children murdered in the Holocaust.

Lass said that residents, volunteers, students and staff who work in the centre are joining in the effort by creating handmade butterflies using various artistic mediums.

"We have young volunteers and students from all over the world, and some have learned very little about the Holocaust. Participating in [this project] has opened their eyes to a historical event that they need to know more about. It will benefit them and everyone they share the story with."

It's hard to believe, she said, that there are young people today who have not heard of the Holocaust.

"Working on the project alongside Holocaust survivors provides unmatched opportunities for discussion. It also serves as a springboard for these individuals to search out more information on the subject, and to share their findings with their own communities.

"Many of our clients and older volunteers are Holocaust survivors, and participating in this project gives them an opportunity in a meaningful social action program."

Lass said her studio plans to have its own butterfly exhibit when enough butterflies have been created. "Butterflies are painted on paper or on silk, some are ceramic, and others are being stuffed as pillows.

"Everyone has the ability to create something, despite any physical limitations they may have."

The Butterfly
Pavel Friedman

The last, the very last,
So richly, brightly, dazzlingly yellow.
Perhaps if the sun's tears would sing
Against a white stone...
Such, such a yellow
Is carried lightly 'way up high.
It went away I'm sure because it wished to Kiss the world good-bye.
For seven weeks I've lived in here,
Penned up inside this ghetto.
But I have found what I loved here.
The dandelions call to me
And the white chestnut branches in the court.
Only I never saw another butterfly.
That butterfly was the last one.
Butterflies don't live in here,
In the ghetto.

In honour of a true hero

Lars Henriksson and Amir Gissin

As we celebrate the 100th anniversary of the birth of Raoul Wallenberg, it is incumbent on us to recall the story of his endeavours during the Holocaust and teach them to the next generations so that his heroism will not be forgotten.

Wallenberg could have led a life of luxury. Born into a prominent aristocratic banking family in Sweden, he was destined to succeed in life. But he was not predestined to be a hero, to save the lives of thousands of strangers – that was his choice.

Guest Voice

In the spring of 1944, the western world was awakening to the horrors of the Holocaust, as authenticated eyewitness reports of the Auschwitz extermination camp were circulated. The United States established the War Refugee Board, whose goal was to save Jews. The WRB's representative in Sweden organized a committee to locate someone to lead a rescue mission in Budapest. Raoul Wallenberg decided to lead the mission and thus try to save the Jews of Hungary from the Nazi death camps following Hitler's invasion of March 1944.

Fortunately, Wallenberg did not have to start his mission from scratch. Per Anger, a junior diplomat in the Swedish Legation in Budapest had already started passing out provisional passports to Jews who had relatives or business colleagues in Sweden. Per Anger also issued special certificates to Jews who had applied for Swedish citizenship.

One of Wallenberg's first tasks as the head of the department for assisting the Jews was to design a Swedish protective pass. These documents had no real standing in international law. However, Wallenberg had an excellent understanding of Nazi bureaucracy because of his previous business dealings in Germany and Nazi-occupied France. He knew that the official-looking passes, with stamps, signatures and the coat of arms of Sweden, would command respect. Wallenberg managed to negotiate a quota of 4,500 passes with the Hungarian authorities, yet in actuality issued three times that number.

Wallenberg didn't stop at issuing protective passes. He also opened "Swedish houses" where Jews could hide. Protected only by a flag and Wallenberg's declaration that these buildings were Swedish territory, 15,000 Jews were given refuge.

Although he held the rank of first secretary at the legation, Wallenberg was not a conventional diplomat. At first, his unique activities stunned his fellow Swedish diplomats. But his success at helping the Jews soon won them over. Then legations of other neutral countries followed suit, issuing protective passes, and a number of other "national houses" were opened.

Though the end of World War II was in sight, the extermination of the Jews continued. SS officer Adolf Eichmann, who was in charge of implementing the "Final Solution" for the European Jews, instituted death marches to deport the Jews of Hungary. Starting in November 1944, tens of thousands of starving Jewish men, women and children were force-marched for hundreds of kilometres in the harsh winter, with many dying along the road.

Raoul Wallenberg did not remain passive in the face of this horrendous crime. He chased the marches in his car, handing out food, clothing, medicine and his special passes.

Despite threat to his life Wallenberg saved Jews

Using threats and bribes, he rescued those Jews who possessed Swedish passes, taking them back to Budapest despite himself being threatened by the guns of the Iron Cross guards.

When deportations took place by train, Wallenberg displayed extraordinary courage, climbing onto railway cars destined for Auschwitz and handing protective passes to the Jews already inside the train. He would then demand that the Jews with passes be taken off the trains – all this under the watchful eyes of armed Nazi soldiers.

Eichmann planned to massacre all the Jews in the largest ghetto, in mid-January 1945. Wallenberg found out about the plot and went into action. Unable to stop the massacre by himself, he turned to the only person who could do so, the commander-in-chief of German troops in Hungary, Gen. August Schmidthuber. Using a trusted go-between, Wallenberg sent a letter to the general, threatening that if the massacre was carried out, he would be held personally responsible and tried as a war criminal when the war was over. The threat worked, and the massacre was cancelled at the last minute.

Mere days later, the Russians entered Hungary. Some 120,000 Hungarian Jews had escaped the Final Solution. It is not known exactly how many owed their survival to the efforts of Raoul Wallenberg, but he is credited with having saved tens of thousands of Jewish lives at the very least.

After the war, Wallenberg should have returned to Sweden a hero. He should have been feted and honoured, lived a long life of happiness, forever treasured by those he saved, their children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. Sadly, that was not to be.

On Jan. 17, 1945, Wallenberg was escorted by Soviet troops to their military headquarters east of Budapest. On his way, he told one of his colleagues that he was not sure if he was going to be the Russians' guest or their prisoner. Raoul Wallenberg has been missing since that day, and his true fate has never been disclosed.

In 1944-45, when Europe was imprisoned in a veil of darkness, an orgy of mass murder and attempted extermination, Wallenberg's feats shone brightly like a singular ray of hope. That's why his legacy lives on in all our memories, in books and TV shows about his life, in the streets and schools named after him and in generations of Jews who are alive today because of his efforts. Wallenberg was awarded honorary American citizenship in a motion put forward by Congressman Tom Lantos, whose life Wallenberg had saved. He was also made an honorary citizen of Israel and of Canada.

In Toronto, as in many other cities, a street was named after Wallenberg, and his statue stands in Earl Bales Park. In May 2008, a campus of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto was renamed after Wallenberg.

That decision itself is significant not only because it enabled many young Jewish Torontonians to be exposed to Wallenberg's courage, vision and humanity, but also because the decision to rename the campus was made through a democratic vote by the students themselves.

Commemorating 100 years since Raoul Wallenberg's birth, we remember his legacy to humankind, especially as antisemitism is on the rise again. Wallenberg must never be forgotten.

Lars Henriksson is the honorary Swedish consul in Toronto. Amir Gissin is the consul general of Israel in Toronto.

Alcohol and the Jews

"Women, ministers and Jews do not get drunk, as a rule, at least they carefully avoid all appearance of it." – Immanuel Kant. [http://bit.ly/jdrink1]

When Kant wrote those words in the late 18th century, he wasn't alone in believing that Jews could handle their liquor better than their non-Jewish neighbours (or at least hide it better). While there may be some anecdotal and scientific justification to that belief, alcoholism is a serious problem in Jewish communities around the world.

The Tanach contains dozens of references to wine and spirits, some of which are positive:

- "Your love is more fragrant than wine" (Song of Songs 1:2).
- "Wine gladdens the heart" (Psalms 104:15).

Others references are less positive: "Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that tarry late into the night, till wine inflame them." (Isaiah 5:11) [http://bit.ly/jdrink2]

Rabbi Daniel Siegel of the Alliance for Jewish Renewal examines Judaism's ambiguous relationship with alcohol, usually wine. Wine is central to the Passover seder and merits being the only liquid that has its own, specific blessing (boray pri hagafen). But the rabbis warn of its dangers. Rabbi Meir says: "That tree, from which Adam ate was a grapevine, for there is nothing that brings calamity on a person more than wine" (Sanhedrin 70a-b). [http://bit.ly/jdrink3]

"Do Jews really drink less than other people? And if so, why?" Time magazine asked those questions back in 1958. The Yale Center of Alcohol Studies had just published a study that suggested that although Jews drank regularly, their rate of alcoholism was negligible compared to other religions. The Time article also reprinted the lyrics to the popular Yiddish song, Shikkur Iz a Goy (Drunken Is a Gentile), which reinforced the perception that the real drinking problem lay elsewhere. [http://bit.ly/jdrink4]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

The Yale report mentioned some reasons that drinking problems were lower among Jews: since Jews spend a lifetime of rituals around wine, excess is avoided. Also, because of the Jewish emphasis on food, "'compulsive' eating is more likely to be selected as a means of alleviating psychic tensions [than] addictive drinking."

Fast forward a few decades. In Confronting Addiction, Marcia Cohn Spiegel and Rabbi Yaacov Kravitz say that the "rate of alcoholism among Jews appears to be less than that among the general population. This difference is probably a product of both cultural and genetic factors." [http://bit.ly/jdrink5]

Genetic factors are what Columbia University's Dr. Deborah Hasin was looking for in a study of Jewish Israelis. She found that 20 per cent carried a gene that helped them resist alcoholism. [http://bit.ly/jdrink6] "This finding adds to the growing body of evidence that this genetic variation has a protective effect against alcoholism among Jewish groups." But Hasin notes that recent immigrants from Russia have a history of heavier drinking despite sharing the protective gene. Hasin concludes that the heavy drinking environment found in Russia could overcome the protective effects of the gene. [http://bit.ly/jdrink7]

And she adds the somewhat sobering observation: Younger Israelis are more likely than older Israelis to drink heavily and to experience alcohol dependence symptoms. [http://bit.ly/jdrink8]

Which brings us to next week's topic, drinking and Purim.

Moving beyond the child's Purim

Purim is an educator's dream.

The Megillah offers a compelling narrative, which can be taught through plays, puppet shows and text study. Like a good Western, the lines are clearly drawn between the heroes and villains, enabling children to cheer and scowl at the appropriate junctures. The customs and rituals – dressing up, gragging graggers, baking hamentashen, delivering mishloach manot, giving matanot le'evyonim, eating a Purim seudah – are engaging and deeply rooted in the messages of the holiday.

With the educator's job made easier, it is no wonder that Purim has evolved into a pediatric holiday. I use this term in two senses. First, it is a holiday centred on children. We ogle over children's costumes, permit noise in the synagogue that would be frowned upon during the year, dole out candy, and have Purim carnivals specifically for children. Children are at the centre of any Purim celebration, demonstrated by the fact that most synagogues do not run separate children's services during Megillah reading, as they would on other holidays. On Purim, the synagogue becomes the children's service.

The pediatric approach to Purim is also manifest in our teaching of the holiday. In many respects, our study of the Megillah and the messages of Purim is stuck in an underdeveloped, elementary phase, rarely seeing the light of fresh, critical, adult analysis. Too often, we allow the narrative of Mordechai and Esther to stagnate in the narrow setting of Shushan without considering its implications for contemporary ethical study, or querying the characters, their actions and decisions.

Class Act

Daniel Held

In instances when we do depart from the Megillah's story, the themes often seem designed more toward engagement than critical analysis. As an observer of high school curriculum and pedagogy, I have seen countless classes and activities focused on the question of drinking on Purim – "ad delo yada," until you cannot discern between Haman and Mordechai – exploring questions such as: Are we required to drink? Permitted to drink? And if so, how much? While a study of alcohol consumption and abuse, and the parameters articulated in rabbinic texts is both engaging for teens and important to discuss, when this represents the outer limit of our teaching of Purim, we miss the boat on the depth of the Megillah's potential as a cornerstone text for teaching complex issues.

The Purim story is ripe with ethical questions for debate: domestic violence, sex trafficking, poverty, slavery, exile, identity conservation and assimilation, consumerism, genocide, and the death penalty.

This year, in addition to dressing our children up in costumes and celebrating with them at a Purim carnival, let's study the Megillah with new lenses. Let's question issues of consumerism and gluttony at Achashverosh's lavish banquets and his wanton treatment of women. Let's explore Mordechai's conflicted relationship with the state and Esther's willingness to conceal her Jewish identity. Let's consider the ethics of the death penalty handed down to Haman and his sons, and of the Jews' request for an extension of their immunity to kill their aggressors.

It's time to free Purim of its tight casting as a children's holiday and view it as a rich opportunity to engage both the young and old.

Bar mitzvahs are a big deal

Our son, Meir Yaacov, recently became a bar mitzvah, and it was a living reminder for us of our family's remarkable and ancient history.

According to Jewish law, a Jewish boy reaching the age of 13 becomes a bar mitzvah and is responsible for assuming the mitzvot of Jewish adulthood. (A girl becomes a bat mitzvah at the age of 12.) Once a bar mitzvah, a boy can be counted in a minyan (prayer quorum) and can lead religious services in the family and the community.

The bar mitzvah age was selected because it roughly coincides with physical puberty. Prior to a child becoming a bar mitzvah, the child's parents are responsible for the child's actions. At this age, bnai mitzvah bear responsibility for their own actions with respect to Jewish ritual law, ethics and tradition and are able to participate in all areas of Jewish community life.

Upon a boy's becoming a bar mitzvah, a celebration is made in his honour. The current scale of celebrations is much greater than it used to be in the mellah, or shtetl, of the old countries. In the old days, this rite of passage was a joyous matter of course for every Jewish child without exception. In more recent times, however, this religious milestone is unfortunately not as absolute as it once was. Hence, we celebrate the occasion with more ostentation to highlight the cherished continuity of our heritage.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

In the Moroccan community, we have many unique customs.

On the eve of the celebration, the bar mitzvah gets a haircut in the presence of his family and, as in every Moroccan celebration, traditional henna is put on his hand.

On the celebratory day, it is customary for the family to help the bar mitzvah boy to don tallit and tfillin, thereby showing him how dear this mitzvah is.

Many had the custom to take the boy to a mikvah, stressing the idea of purity and holiness.

Some had the custom of snatching the tfillin from the boy, so that the father would be obliged to redeem them with money, thereby demonstrating their importance.

When the bar mitzvah is called to the Torah, it is customary for the women to ululate "lulululu." This custom originates from a Kabalistic source stating that in every holy and happy occasion, the evil inclination, the yetzer hara, is challenged to act. Thus, the women scream out in order to confuse and to chase away the yetzer hara.

It's hardly an exaggeration to say that the future of the Jewish People depends in large measure upon the bar (and bat) mitzvah event. Education, and particularly education of our young, has been and remains the means by which we continue to thrive, indeed to exist. Is it any wonder that we celebrate with such gusto, as families and communities, this uniquely Jewish simchah, by which we renew ourselves and our time in Jewish history?

Give your children an equal share.

Judt generates controversy from beyond the grave

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The letters to the editor sections of book review journals are often among the most entertaining, and instructive areas of print journalism. It's an opportunity for authors whose ample egos have been bruised by even one negative comment to lash out that the reviewer has misconstrued their work. Occasionally, the argument is made that the reviewer, often a major figure in his or her own right, is unqualified to pass judgment.

Such was the case with Timothy Snyder's letter in the Feb. 19 New York Times Book Review. Snyder, a prominent historian of Europe, helped Tony Judt, an eminent academic and public intellectual, then paralyzed with Lou Gehrig's disease (from which he died in 2010), write the posthumously published Thinking the Twentieth Century.

Francis Fukuyama is every bit Judt's intellectual equal, if not his intellectual superior, and the famous author of the End of History. It was Fukuyama's Feb. 5 review of Judt that elicited a stinging rebuke from Snyder.

Fukuyama began his review by drawing attention to what was most controversial about Judt: "Tony Judt was known to many people as the public intellectual who aroused a firestorm of criticism for an article he wrote in The New York Review of Books in 2003, calling for Israel to become a binational state and to lose its specifically Jewish character. That essay, as well as biting critiques of the Iraq war and the Israel lobby, earned him considerable enmity in some quarters."

Fukuyama commended Judt for taking on, in an earlier work (Past Imperfect), leftist French intellectuals such as Jean Paul Sartre who, in the post-World War II period, blindly supported Stalinism in the naive belief that it was a progressive liberation movement. Fukuyama, quoting Judt, said that he rightly criticized "how so many smart people could have told themselves such stories, with all the terrible consequences that ensued."

Concerning Judt's last book, Fukuyama acknowledged Judt's rebuke to a number of writers, himself included, who had endorsed then-U.S. president George W. Bush's 2003 invasion of Iraq (something Fukuyama later regretted). However, Fukuyama argued that Judt failed to be introspective about some of his own views, foremost his denunciations of Israel. This is an important point, given the tremendous influence Judt has had among leftists and critics of Israel.

It's worth citing Fukuyama at length here: "[Judt] argues that Israelis and their American supporters have used the Holocaust as a 'Get Out of Jail Free card for a rogue state,' but seems to think that his own Jewishness and the fact that he lived in Israel at one point give him the authority to be as morally obtuse in return. Judt seems intent on transferring the lessons learned in eastern Europe, where genuine liberalism mostly replaced ethnic nationalism, to a part of the world where such liberalism just won't work. His proposal for a binational state was put forward with the self-certainty of an intellectual who has never had to deal with the realities of practicality and power. But he remained little inclined to give ground to critics he believed could be motivated only by bad intentions."

It's interesting that Snyder, replying on behalf of Judt, steered clear of any mention of Judt's position on Israel, which occupies so much of Fukuyama's review. Instead, Snyder attacked Fukuyama for something Fukuyama had already admitted being wrong about – Iraq. Citing what Fukuyama, as noted above, recognized as a significant question raised by Judt, Snyder asked "why he and so many other brilliant people could generate so much persuasive error on [the Iraq war]." Yet, again, Snyder refused to consider how this same question applies to Judt on Israel. Criticizing Fukuyama for even being wrong about "the nature of history in general," Snyder claimed that "denying the significance of the past generates poor decisions."

Ironically, with respect to Israel and Zionism, this is the very sort of denial of history, including Israel's recent one of seeking a compromise with the Palestinians, that weighs against Judt.

Hamilton doc to be honoured by West Indies U

Holly Ginsler
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Physician, former president of Temple Anshe Sholom, Jewish community leader, mohel and philanthropist Tony MacFarlane is all of these things.

He will receive the University of the West Indies' Vice-Chancellor's Award March 10 at the Four Seasons Hotel in Toronto at the third annual benefit gala hosted by the university.

Tony MacFarlane

MacFarlane is bequeathing his Hamilton home to the University of the West Indies in Jamaica, which was established in 1948. "You donate the house, you live in it until you die, and then the university takes it over," MacFarlane said.

He has also donated 2,000 classical CDs to the university and sends it money every year for a scholarship fund and a prize. The Vice-Chancellor's Award "recognizes what I have been doing for the alumnus association," he said.

MacFarlane was born in Salisbury, Jamaica, in 1937, where he grew up on his grandparents' plantation.

"My grandmother was the most important person in my life," he said.

He attended four elementary schools because his grandfather was able to afford the tuition. He was surrounded by poverty and said he was the only boy in the school who could afford shoes.

MacFarlane was a student at the University of the West Indies from 1957 to 1959. He then came to Canada, originally on a 10-week holiday, and ended up staying and completing a two-year pre-med course at McMaster University in Hamilton. He attended the University of Toronto medical school from 1961 to 1965. After interning in emergency medicine in Hamilton, he decided to take a year off and travel to Paris. He learned to speak and read French fluently so that he could read books in the original form. He also had the opportunity to study the piano.

After he returned to Hamilton and opened an office, MacFarlane began collecting rare books and has donated parts of his book collection to McMaster University, York University and the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library at the University of Toronto.

MacFarlane had known as a child that his grandmother, Agatha Mendes, was Jewish. She was the illegitimate child of David Pereira Mendes. But it wasn't until MacFarlane came to Hamilton in 1959 and attended Temple Anshe Sholom that he became interested in his Jewish background.

The congregants at the Reform temple had never heard of the Jewish surname Mendes, and MacFarlane eventually recognized that the congregation's members were primarily Ashkenazi Jews.

"I went into the library and looked into the Jewish Encyclopedia and found six pages of the name Mendes," he said. He realized then that his roots were Sephardi, and traced his ancestry back to the Portuguese Jews who left Spain, moved to Portugal and eventually emigrated to the Caribbean and Jamaica.

"I came to Canada, I stayed, I discovered my Jewish roots," he said.

In 1988, Hurricane Gilbert struck Jamaica. MacFarlane took the first flight back to check on the status of a house he owned on the northern coast. He found himself in Kingston on Erev Yom Kippur and attended services at a Reform synagogue that had been badly damaged by the hurricane. When MacFarlane inquired if the services were still taking place, he was told that part of the roof had been torn off and they had no electricity. They suggested that he bring his own umbrella and his own folding chair.

"This synagogue has sand on the floors," MacFarlane said. "It's an old Morrano custom. It's supposed to deaden the footsteps of the people when they are in the cellars praying."

The Morranos, or Conversos, were the Jews of the Iberian Peninsula who converted to Christianity but secretly practised Jewish customs.

The service was an awakening for MacFarlane. "I went to the Kol Nidre service, and that's when I felt Jewish. Because when you convert, how do you know when you're going to feel Jewish? I always assumed it would happen, but I didn't know when. And it happened in Jamaica."

Every year, MacFarlane returns to the same Jamaican Synagogue for the High Holidays.

In 1992, Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz at Temple Anshe Sholom was looking for people to become mohels, as the Reform movement was beginning to certify mohels. He encouraged MacFarlane to complete the course, and the doctor practised as a mohel in the Hamilton area for many years.

"It was an interesting experience being a mohel, meeting different kinds of people," MacFarlane said.

"Everything came together for me, and all because of Hamilton, of all places. Who knew?" he said.

Crown will not prosecute nursing home death

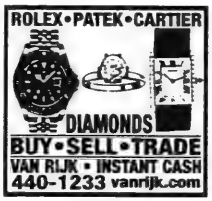
Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Manitoba's Justice Department has declined to prosecute in the October 2010 death of Lilyan Peck, a 93-year-old resident of the Simkin Centre, Winnipeg's longtime Jewish nursing home.

Shortly before her passing, Peck was transferred from the home to a hospital, where it was found she was suffering from severe, untreated bed sores. She died shortly thereafter. As a result, one nurse at the Simkin Centre – also known as the Sharon Home – was fired, while seven others received short suspensions.

For Peck's daughter, Marsha Palansky, that wasn't enough. She was joined in demanding answers by Harvey Berkal and his sister, Harriet Berkal Sarbit – whose father, the late Rabbi Louis Berkal, was a Simkin resident for the last year of his life – and others who were unhappy with the level of care at the seniors home.

Last fall, after several reviews into the Simkin Centre's operations, with follow-up reports recommending changes, the Berkals and Palansky launched a private prosecution related to Peck's death.



Speaking for the province late last month, Crown attorney Colleen McDuff said she met with the complainants, who gave her a lot of material to review.

"A number of Crown attorneys in addition to myself went over the material," she said. "Criminal negligence is very difficult to prove. After reviewing the material, we determined that the evidence did not support a case beyond reasonable doubt."

McDuff said that out of courtesy, and in light of the complainants' efforts, she agreed to forward the case materials to police to determine if there is enough evidence to file a criminal complaint.

"The Crown won't be pursuing any further action," she said.

While expressing disappointment about the Crown's decision on behalf of Palansky, his sister and himself, Harvey Berkal, who is a lawyer, said the three are pleased that police might become involved.

"There should have been a police investigation a long time ago," he said. "The coroner should have looked into Lilyan Peck's death, too. We still don't know what led to her death.

"We want to make sure that this kind of thing doesn't happen at the Sharon Home ever again. We would like to see the Sharon Home setting the standard for quality care for the elderly."

Berkal believes the seniors home should have a full-time nurse practitioner on staff. Nurse practitioners in Manitoba are licensed to perform many of the functions of a doctor.

"We are also not happy that residents are forced to be treated only by Sharon Home-approved doctors instead of their own family doctors," Berkal said.

Bill Brownstone, acting chair of the Simkin Centre, said that "the Crown intervened in the private prosecution brought by Mr. Berkal against the Simkin Centre and has dropped all charges, because there was no reasonable likelihood of conviction.

Referring to a press release issued by Berkal about the Crown's decision, Brownstone added: "The Simkin Centre understands that the Berkal prosecution has been terminated, and it knows of no factual basis for the suggestion [by Berkal] that the Crown has recommended further investigation or that any criminal proceedings of any kind are being contemplated by any authority."

Tourism minister says 'bienvenue'

MONTREAL — It was Israeli Tourism Minister Stas Misezhnikov's first visit to Montreal, but he felt at home.

Growing up in the Soviet Union, he, like many of his compatriots, was a huge hockey fan and the Montreal Canadiens were then the most revered team in the sport.

"I remember, I think it was 1979, the Canadiens came to Moscow to play the top Soviet team. There was no school, no traffic on the street. Everyone stayed home and watched the game," said Misezhnikov, who was 10 at the time.

That's the kind of icebreaker Israeli tourism officials are hoping will help win over the Quebec market, which it's paying a lot more attention to these days. Misezhnikov is the first Israeli tourism minister to make an official visit to Quebec in more than 10 years.

'New' Middle East not so new: scholar

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Arab Spring is more like an Islamist winter, says Arab-world scholar Mordechai Kedar, with countries degenerating into fragmented, tribal strife, violence and Islamic fundamentalism.

But in some ways that could be to Israel's benefit, Kedar, a lecturer at Bar-Ilan University who is associated with the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies, argued at the Canadian Zionist Federation eastern region's recent annual Zave Ettinger Memorial Lecture in Montreal.

Mordechai Kedar

"The Syrian state is fragmented, so that's good for Israel," Kedar said to an audience of about 100 at Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation.

The Syrian regime under Bashar Assad, who is now reportedly killing his own people because they want his ouster, failed to create any sense of "awareness" of one peoplehood that could have helped the country move toward independence, instead of continuing on as an Iranian client-state.

"Assad was seeking legitimacy, but that is not going to happen," said Kedar, who speaks Arabic fluently.

Kedar said he recently launched another research centre at Bar-Ilan that will require scholars to have knowledge of Arabic and other languages, because that is essential for proper understanding of the Arab world.

He is still asked about his controversial 2008 interview in Arabic on the satellite TV news channel Al Jazeera – still viewable on YouTube – in which he asserted that Jerusalem belonged to the Jews, "when your forefathers… were burying girls alive and worshipping pre-Muslim idols…"

During his synagogue talk, Kedar was less polemical but still characteristically blunt. The Arab Spring and the democratic "new Middle East" that was supposed to come about after the Egyptian government fell about a year ago is obviously not going to happen, in Kedar's view.

"This, of course, became the mantra of journalists," but, he asked, is the "new" Middle East really new?

In Egypt, he said, three-quarters of the Egyptian regional council is "very Islamist."

In Libya, leader Moammar Gadhafi is dead, but "everyone is fighting each other."

In Morocco, there are now free elections, ostensibly a positive development, but that is tempered by the success of Islamists in those same elections. In Tunisia, Kedar said, tribalism abounds, as does Islamist encroachment and influence. Iraq, he noted, has 74 tribes, with its many clans fighting among themselves in a relatively small country, not to mention the ongoing strife between Sunni and Shiite Muslims.

"It's not like Canada," Kedar said, "where you have 20 rivers every 10 kilometres. Iraq is a failing state."

In spite of the influence of modernism from the West, Kedar said, the vast majority of the Middle East has not budged from the mores and traditions that have kept the Arab world prisoners of its past.

In this environment, he said, Israel remains the only real democracy in the Middle East, and a society where issues like women sitting in the rear of public busses pales by comparison.

"Israel is a bastion of stability and sanity," he said.

Even if you think Israeli-Arabs are "second-class" citizens in Israel, "they would prefer to be second class there than first class somewhere else in the Middle Eastern alternatives," Kedar said.

Complaint against Radio-Canada upheld

Coverage of Israel biased, says ombudsman

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Radio-Canada's ombudsman has upheld complaints that its Middle East coverage has been biased against Israel.

Pierre Tourangeau was responding to five specific instances of alleged bias lodged against the French-language public broadcaster by HonestReporting Canada. They concerned radio reports by Middle East correspondent Ginette Lamarche that aired from Dec. 19 to 23.

In a 12-page review issued Feb. 14, Tourangeau concluded that Lamarche's reporting violated Radio-Canada's standards for balance, impartiality and accuracy.

HonestReporting is a pro-Israel media monitoring group. "Significantly, Tourangeau found a lack of 'diversity of opinion' as required for news coverage of controversial subjects, use of unverified facts and failure to challenge claims which led to 'at least an appearance of bias'," said HonestReporting's Quebec regional director, Michelle Whiteman.

It's the second rebuke Lamarche has received from the ombudsman in the past year in response to complaints from a pro-Israel group.

Last year, Tourangeau upheld a series of complaints by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) about her reporting from June 5 to 7 on the deadly clash at the Syrian border between pro-Palestinian demonstrators and the Israeli army.

The latest complaints cite Lamarche's reporting, without factual backup, on years-long imprisonment of Palestinian youths "for participating in a demonstration or throwing stones," the claim Israel imprisoned almost as many people as it released in exchange for captured soldier Gilad Schalit, and that the security barrier and Jewish settlements around Bethlehem prevent Palestinians from leaving the city without permission.

She also reported that Christian Palestinians are fleeing because of the barrier and that Israel's control of tourism is of little benefit to Bethlehem.

Radio-Canada did correct one error cited by HonestReporting. On Dec. 22, Lamarche used the Arabic term nakba that Palestinians use to refer to the 1948 creation of the State of Israel without explaining that it means "catastrophe." That revision was aired prior to the ombudsman's review.

Tourangeau found fault with these reports because they offered only a Palestinian viewpoint, and he said data Lamarche provided were not verified or challenged, and sometimes not attributed.

He expressed the hope that the management of Radio-Canada and its journalists will engage in a serious discussion of its methods of news gathering and reporting.

In other news related to Israel's portrayal in the Quebec media, representatives of B'nai Brith Canada, Quebec region, met with the management of the V television network to express their concerns about program host Stéphane Gendron. The organization described his on-air comments on Israel as "grossly offensive."

B'nai Brith said in a Feb. 17 statement that it found the exchange "positive."

"The network provided its guarantee of increased vigilance to prevent such comments making it to air," said legal counsel Steven Slimovitch. Measures to be put in place include a six-second delay for live programming.

"B'nai Brith accepted these guarantees and agreed to collaborate with the management of the network in future programming initiatives."

Gendron, co-host of the talk show Face à Face, said on Dec. 29 that Israel "doesn't deserve to exist." It was the latest in a history of remarks about Israel and Jews dating back to 2006 that have offended Jewish groups.

On Feb. 1, representatives of CIJA and HonestReporting also met with V managers to discuss their objections to Gendron and emerged satisfied with the outcome.

Educator recalled as 'witty' and 'fearless'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Those who knew educator, feminist, and Jewish studies enthusiast Selma Sage say the Jewish community lost a vibrant, "feisty" woman.

Sage, 79, who died suddenly from natural causes at the Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre in Toronto on Feb. 19, was always eager to share the wisdom she had gathered throughout her years as a lifelong student and educator.

Rebecca Oyen, Sage's granddaughter, said she was a "dynamic" teacher.

"She didn't know how to live without teaching," Oyen said. "She always made it abundantly clear that education came before anything else."

Lois Sage said her mother was a brilliant woman.

"She didn't suffer fools gladly. I'll tell you that. She was the brightest woman I have ever met, and she could speak on almost every subject," Sage said.

She skipped two grades as a child and entered her first year of university at the University of Pennsylvania when she was just 16.

After obtaining her master's degree at the Harvard Graduate School of Education, she specialized in teacher training and curriculum design for religious schools at the Chicago and Great Lakes Regional Office of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

She went on to serve as educational director at the Olin-Sang-Ruby Union Institute Camp in Wisconsin and the Washington Hebrew Congregation in Washington, D.C., before she was recruited by the late Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut to join Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple as educational director.

Oyen said that for her grandmother, teaching and learning went hand in hand.

"She would listen to everyone's perspective. Nothing was lecture, it was always discussions and seminars."

Rabbi Lori Cohen, who leads Temple Shalom in Kitchener-Waterloo, met Sage 11 years ago when she joined Temple Sinai Congregation in Toronto as an associate rabbi.

In addition to teaching her own courses at the shul, Sage often attended the Torah classes that Rabbi Cohen led.

"She came to my Torah classes all the time. There were people who feared her presence, because she could take over and be opinionated. I loved her wit and her humour, and I always thought she added so much to the discussions," Rabbi Cohen said.

"She was abrasive, she was witty, she was feisty," she said.

And when it came to one of her passions, feminism, Oyen said Sage was not afraid to speak out.

"She used to live across the street from a very Orthodox synagogue, and they would invite her to come to services," Oyen recalled.

"She did, and they made her sit upstairs. She then spoke to the rabbi and said, 'I'm sorry, I can't do this because my voice needs to be heard, too, and I should have an equal voice. I should be able to sit where everyone else sits, and I won't be coming back.'"

Sage said her late mother also led feminist seders for Hadassah-WIZO that would include symbols of female oppression – such as girdles and aprons – in the centrepiece.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, who served as an assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom and until recently as the director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, also remembers Sage, whom she met when she first moved to Toronto in 1983, as an unapologetic feminist.

"She was really fearless about putting forth women's agendas and making sure women were represented on committees in synagogues, on the bimah, in leadership. It was a passion of hers," Rabbi Goldstein said.

"She was a great teacher. She taught at the Kolel for many years and she was always supportive of learning, and I will remember her as a great educator and one of the foremost Jewish feminists in town."

Having known Sage since 2001, Rabbi Cohen said she noticed a change in her following the passing of her husband of 28 years, Sam Siegelman, last May.

Sage was battling health issues and living at the Thorne Mills retirement home in Thornhill, and Rabbi Cohen said she felt Sage had given up on her passions.

"She really was so crushed after he died. It was so sad."

Unfortunately, Sage was no stranger to coping with devastating loss.

Lois, Sage's only daughter, said her mother suffered the loss of her 24-year-old son, Robert, as well as another child, who died three days after birth.

But Sage was a resilient, spirited woman, and as Rabbi Cohen remembers her, a "powerful presence."

"Wherever you met her, she filled a room. She called on people to be the best they can be. She challenged people," the rabbi said.

"She was the most wonderful, giving, loving [woman]," Lois added.

"She made everyone feel as though they were special."

Stark was a pioneering orchestra conductor

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Ethel Stark, credited with being the first Canadian woman to achieve international recognition as a symphonic conductor, died Feb. 16. According to biographical sources, she was born in August 1916.

A trailblazer for women in classical music, Stark was conductor and co-founder in 1940 of the Montreal Women's Symphony Orchestra (MWSO), as well as an accomplished violinist.

At a time when women were almost totally excluded from professional symphony orchestras, Stark created the orchestra, composed of over 80 women, the first of its kind in Canada. She conducted it for more than a quarter of a century.

In 1947, the MWSO became the first Canadian orchestra to play at Carnegie Hall in New York, and it later performed around the world.

Born in Montreal, Stark was the first Canadian – male or female – to win a scholarship in a worldwide competition to the Curtis Institute of Philadelphia, where she studied from 1928-34, after attending the McGill Conservatory of Music.

She toured and broadcast as a violin soloist, nationally and internationally.

She guest conducted orchestras in Canada, including the Toronto Symphony in 1946, as well as in the United States, Israel and Japan.

Stark was also an educator and taught for 11 years at Le Conservatoire de Musique de Québec à Montréal and later at Sir George Williams University (now Concordia University). She did research on the orchestral repertoire for the Library of Congress.

Stark received many honours in her lifetime, including the Order of Canada in 1979, the Ordre nationale du Québec in 2003, an honorary doctorate from Concordia University in 1980, and the annual award of the Concert Society of Jewish People's and Peretz Schools in 1976.

In an interview with The CJN more than 25 years ago, Stark commented on the MWSO's Carnegie Hall performance: "We had a great success. I can't believe our nerve."

Although there were opportunities elsewhere, Stark remained loyal to her city and country.

חבל. אבל שישאר בינינו.

סדרת מפגשים בעברית

יעל פולונסקי, שליחת "הבונים דרור" שעובדת עם הקהילה הישראלית בדאון טאון, יוזמת סדרת מפגשים בעברית שבה ירצו אחת לחודש מרצים אורחים ואחר כך יתקיים דיון בהשתתפות הקהל.

ב- 11 במרץ ירצה אריאל זלצמן, מנהל בית הספר "בחול לבן" על חינוך לילדים ישראליים בחו"ל. ב- 22 באפריל ירצה אילן דיבון על "ההזדמנות שבגלות", על מינוף הקושי והריחוק לשינוי חיובי וצמיחה אישית.

Hatred: Coming to a campus near you

Opinion

Dore Gold

Anti-Israel hatred on campus crests each year during an event called Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW).

With an ominous name and programs that thrive on ignorance and blind disregard for the facts, tens of thousands of college students are urged to rise up against Israel – painfully evoking the types of racist characterizations of the Jewish people that defined attitudes once heard in Europe in the middle of the last century.

Warning: this year's display will come to a campus near you next week.

These campus initiatives were incubated in 2001 at the first Durban anti-racism conference, proclaiming "no apartheid South Africa in the 20th century and no apartheid Israel in the 21st."

This battle cry sparked the BDS movement calling for boycotts, divestment and sanctions to punish Israel, and it evolved into an invective-loaded campaign that found a degree of favour on campuses coast to coast, not to mention among some labour unions, churches, media and cultural institutions. But it is based on a lie.

Typically, those hurling these charges against Israel hope that their audiences are ignorant of the facts. In apartheid South Africa, blacks were not allowed to use white hospitals, they could not attend white universities and they could not participate in the South African parliament.

Visit Hadassah Hospital today, or any other health facility in Israel, and see Jewish and Arab doctors caring for Jewish and Arab patients. Witness Jewish and Arab professors teach students of different backgrounds. Go to the Knesset and observe the debates between Jewish and Arab parliamentarians.

Given this reality, Justice Richard Goldstone, a former judge on the South African Supreme Court, wrote in the New York Times that the "charge that Israel is an apartheid state is a false and malicious one that precludes, rather than promotes, peace and harmony."

Goldstone, it should be remembered, did not have a problem criticizing Israeli policies in the aftermath of its 2008-09 military operation in the Gaza Strip. But when it came to calling Israel an apartheid state like the old South Africa, with which he was intimately familiar, he firmly rejected the charge.

No group cherishes or champions freedom of speech more than the Jewish People. But the systematic dissemination of hate-based lies is not what freedom is about. This crosses the line. No one has a licence to lie, manipulate or manufacture falsehoods.

Make no mistake, the primary characteristics of IAW programming are terrible, unjustified charges expressly aimed at demonizing Israel.

Unsubstantiated allegations, constantly repeated, take a toll on North American opinion, despite bedrock gut support for Israel, which, thankfully, exists as a strong counter-force to this mass exercise in propaganda.

Studies confirm that when accurate information about Israeli policies, society and values is provided, the false arguments are uniformly rejected.

Our most critical challenge is to educate the young and to begin this process during high school years or earlier – long before they arrive on college campuses.

Our students feel confident and empowered when they know the facts and can challenge group-think favouring Israel's isolation, dismantlement or destruction.

We are duty-bound to engage students in creative, effective ways, through the media they best relate to: Facebook, Twitter and other social media.

We must knock down the posturing of the IAW agitators, who don't care about promoting peace or helping people in the Mideast.

Encouraged by foreign governments that do not share Israel's commitment to democracy and human rights, they are the purveyors of hatred, akin to many others who have preceded them.

Here's the good news: friends of Israel are not backing off or ignoring the challenge. Important new initiatives are already in the works to roll back the hatred.

We must spare no effort to protect full legal rights and freedom of speech for pro-Israel students on campus.

Specifically, I conclude with a vitally important call to action, as easy to do as it is effective: I invite you to watch a film of monumental importance called Crossing the Line.

This powerful 30-minute documentary exposes the growing anti-Israel sentiments taking root on college campuses across North America.

Once you understand the problem, I hope you will join me in my quest to make sure all Jewish students are educated and empowered with the facts about Israel.

If modern Jewish history has taught our generation anything, it is that no threat to our existence should ever be ignored. Generations to come will judge us for what we do – or do not do – today to secure Israel's future.

Dore Gold is president of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs and former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations. He is a senior adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. To find out about a screening of Crossing the Line in your area, visit www.stepupforisrael.

Fact cards to be distributed on campuses

Pro-Israel students at campuses such as the University of Ottawa, York University, Ryerson University and the University of British Columbia will distribute fact cards and posters produced by Hasbara, as well as screen a documentary called Israel Inside and provide advocacy training.

"This isn't an issue of spin for us. This is about truth versus falsehood," Hamdy said.

CAPME's response to IAW is to run a speaker series this month that presents a balanced view of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Tel Aviv University professor David Menashri, University of Maryland professor Yoram Peri, Notre Dame University professor Alan Dowty, and Italian photojournalist Ruben Salvadori will visit Canadian campuses on the speaking tour.

Another organization dedicated to addressing the anti-Israel narrative on campus is JerusalemOnlineU.com, which provides video-based education about Israel and Judaism.

Amy Holtz, JerusalemOnlineU.com president, said its new campaign, called Step Up For Israel, also aims to counter IAW with a film called Crossing the Line: the Intifada Comes to Campus, which can be viewed on the group's website.

The idea behind the film and the campaign – chaired by Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz and former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations Dore Gold – is to expose the anti-Israel movement on campus as being largely antisemitic.

"It's a powerful film, and it really is designed to make people understand the problem, and they need to prepare their kids," Holtz said.

She said it's important to educate students before someone else does.

"I want our kids to know the truth about Israel so they don't hear about it for the first time from an anti-Israel guy with a one-sided agenda... I want our kids to know that this isn't the truth. Israel is not an apartheid state."

Holtz said her organization is also working with Canadian Jewish groups to screen Israel Inside in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa.

Hillel at Ryerson president Mitch Reiss said one of the approaches Hillel has adopted is to partner with other campus groups to give a positive image of Israel.

He said Hillel has developed relationships with groups such as AEPi and Delta Pi, the Jewish fraternities, as well as the Catholic Students' Association and the Jewish Business Network.

"We really built a network of different groups and work together, with each group taking on their project and angle for advocacy," Reiss said

"Rather than it being a response to IAW, it's a week of education to let people know about the amazing things that are going on in Israel."

Taking place weekly until the end of the semester on GTA campuses is a campaign called Hot Chocolate, Hot Topics.

"We'll be handing out hot chocolate while presenting information about a hot issue, whether it be women's rights, LBGT issues, or the environment," Reiss said.

Last week, Hillel students at the University of Toronto set up an informational table to promote Save A Child's Heart, an Israeli-based international humanitarian project that provides free cardiac care for poor children with life-threatening heart disease in Third World countries.

"We're definitely trying to be more proactive to plan programming that we're excited about and not just a response. It's what we want to showcase about Israel," said Beca Bookman, Hillel's U of T Israel committee chair.

Later this month, Hillel will present an event with Chefs for Peace, an Israeli nonprofit organization that uses culinary arts to build bridges between different faith communities. Three Israeli chefs – a Jew, a Muslim and an Armenian – will tour GTA campuses in the second week of March giving cooking demonstrations.

"We think it'll be a good opportunity to open dialogue and discussion," Bookman said.

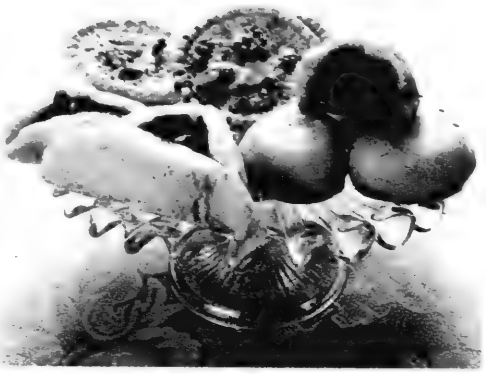
Sharing delicious Purim treats

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN



Purim is a celebration of justice, where evil was dealt a fatal blow and life continued, if only for a little while, happily.

At Purim, as with most holidays, Jews can state, "They tried to kill us, we won, let's eat."

However at Purim we must add an addendum: "Let's help others eat as well." We are traditionally obligated to send mishloach manot, sometimes called shalach manot, a gift of at least two different items of food, drink or sweets that can be eaten immediately. These should be sent not only to our families and friends, but to those less fortunate than ourselves.

Food is a celebration of life. It keeps us well, and at the same time, it's a source of joy and delight. The gift of food is also an opportunity to help the community and strengthen relationships among people.

Purim baskets are easy to put together, and making them can be an enjoyable family event.

First, make a list of the recipients of your baskets and decide what you want the baskets to contain. Fruit, nuts, dried fruit, small bottles of grape juice or wine, hamantashen and other baked treats as well as candies are popular choices.

Next, select your containers. Visit the dollar store, where you will find a treasure trove of interesting containers, baskets and boxes to fill, or be creative and design your own container from paper or fabric. Don't forget the transparent wrapping paper and shredded coloured tissue paper to line the bottom of the baskets or containers! Settle on what you plan to bake and write a shopping list. When you have everything you need, prepare the baked goods and wrap them in plastic wrap. Assemble and wrap the baskets. Plan to deliver the baskets on Purim. If you have young children, it's great fun to let them help deliver the baskets while wearing their Purim costumes.

The Purim pastries below are fun to make, scrumptious to eat and great to share.

HAMANTASHEN WITH CHOCOLATE GANACHE FILLING

Purim baskets made easy

Remove the chocolate from the microwave and whisk until all lumps are gone. Chill in refrigerator until filling is firm.

Preheat oven to 350. Line cookie sheets with parchment paper. In a food processor, beat eggs and sugar until light and fluffy. Add margarine or butter and orange zest. Add the flour, baking powder and salt into the batter to form dough. Cool in fridge for about 20 minutes.

On a floured board, roll out dough to 1/4-in. thick, and with a glass or cookie cutter, cut dough into 3-in. circles. Spoon 1 tsp. of filling into centre of each circle. Pinch edges tightly to form three corners. A small amount of the filling should peek out. Bake for 12-15 minutes, until golden brown. Place cookie sheets on wire racks until cool. Makes about two dozen hamantashen.

STUFFED MIDDLE EASTERN PURIM COOKIES

Purim's answer to how they get the caramel into the Caramilk bar!

1 1/2 cups margarine or butter
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. orange zest
4 cups flour
6-8 tbsp. water
1/2 cup coarsely ground walnuts,
12 oz. pitted dates
2 tsp. fresh orange juice
1 tbsp. orange zest
icing sugar for rolling if desired

Place margarine or butter, sugar and orange zest in food processor and process until combined. Add flour and process until it is a crumbly consistency. Add water until soft dough forms. (Dough will form a ball shape in processor.) Cover for about 30 minutes.

In a separate bowl, combine the next four ingredients.

To bake: preheat oven to 350. Line cookie sheets with parchment paper. Form dough into walnut-size balls. Flatten slightly and make a hole in the centre with your thumb. Fill with a heaping teaspoon of filling. Press sides together to close the dough. Roll in your hands to reform into a ball. Place on cookie sheet 1-2 in. apart. Make a design on top with fork tines. Bake 25-30 minutes, or until light brown in colour. Cool on wire rack. When cool, roll in icing sugar. Makes about 80 cookies.

ORANGE PECAN TARTS

3 packages of frozen tart shells (36 tart shells)
3 eggs
1 cup honey
1/2 cup brown sugar
1/3 cup margarine or butter
2 tsp. pure vanilla
zest of one large orange
2 tbsp. Grand Marnier
1/4 tsp. salt
1 1/2 cups pecan halves

Preheat oven to 350. Place tart shells on a baking sheet and par-bake for 10 minutes. Remove from oven. In a large bowl or processor, combine eggs, honey, brown sugar, margarine or butter, vanilla, orange zest, Grand Marnier and salt. Divide pecans between the tart shells. Spoon mixture into each tart shell covering over the pecans, tart shells should be full. Return to oven and bake for 20 minutes, or until tart edges are light brown and the filling is golden. Cool on wire rack.

New blood test offers early cancer detection

Israel21c.org

Israeli researchers have developed a simple and cheap blood test that was found to provide early detection for many types of cancer in clinical trials.

The promising new blood test, developed by scientists at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU) and Soroka University Medical Center in Be'er Sheva, can detect minuscule changes in the blood of a person with a cancerous growth somewhere in the body, even before the disease has spread.

Early diagnosis of cancer could save thousands of lives. Every day in the United States, 1,500 people die of cancer, according to the American Cancer Society. Cancer is the second most common cause of death in the States after heart disease, accounting for one in four deaths.

Medical specialists believe that earlier detection greatly increases the chances for successful treatment. It also prevents the need for long, painful and costly treatments when the cancer reaches a more advanced stage.

The researchers, led by Prof. Joseph Kapelushnik of BGU's faculty of health sciences, have developed a device that illuminates cancer cells within less than a teaspoonful of blood. The test uses infrared light to detect tiny changes that indicate cancer, because the light is absorbed slightly differently due to various molecules released into the bloodstream.

In a clinical trial involving 200 patients and a control group, the test identified specific common cancers such as lung and ovarian cancer in 90 per cent of the patients and found other types of cancer, as well.

"This is still research in the early stages of clinical trials," said Kapelushnik, who is also head of the department of pediatric hemato-oncology at Soroka hospital.

"But the purpose is to develop an efficient, cheap and simple method to detect as many types of cancers as possible. We want to be able to detect cancer while a patient is still feeling good, before it has a chance to metastasize, meaning fewer treatments, less suffering and many more lives saved."

More clinical trials will be conducted in the next 18 months.

Psychiatrist writes about midlife meltdowns

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

If you've ever wanted to be a fly on a psychiatrist's sofa, pick up a copy of Keeping Your Cool Thru Your Mid-life Meltdown by Dr. Fred Shane. The Winnipeg native moved to Vancouver two years ago and put his 35 years' psychiatric experience to creative use assembling a series of stories from his practice, all of them fairly typical of individuals experiencing a midlife crisis.

"I think these are important issues," he says, adding that each chapter represents a collage of experiences rather than the story of an individual patient. Names have been changed, circumstances altered and anonymity strictly protected. Each story is followed by a paragraph of Therapist's Notes, in which Shane speculates on the significance of a particular midlife meltdown and how the particular one he described was resolved.

They're the kind of stories many of us have read about in newspaper and magazine advice columns. The married man who has a cyber-affair, the obese woman trying to lose weight, the WASPy mother up in arms because her son is dating a black woman and the millionaire whose kids are at odds with his new fiancée.

In each story we get the perspective of the psychiatrist and learn how Shane has responded to and assisted his patients. He touches on Botox, domestic abuse, erectile dysfunction and phobias among other issues. For the fly on the couch, this book is an excursion directly into his office.

Iran characterizes Oscar win as victory over Israel

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Iran's state television on Monday described the country's Academy Award win for best foreign-language film as a victory over Israel, in a gesture of official approval of an Iranian movie industry criticized by hardliners.

The official reaction to the Oscar win by A Separation in Sunday's awards ceremony was cast in nationalist terms and in the light of Iran's confrontation with its arch-foe, which also had a film, Footnote, competing for the foreign-language Oscar. The broadcast said the award won by A Separation succeeded in "leaving behind" a film from the "Zionist regime." It emphasized that the film won several Iranian awards in 2011, too. To portray a film award as a nationalist triumph is a departure for the state media.

Iran has an extensive movie industry, and the country's films have won wide international acclaim, even as other sectors of the economy face sanctions and other forms of pressure over Tehran's controversial nuclear program.

Meanwhile, the Israeli and Iranian filmmakers sat together on a panel discussion.

The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences had invited the five directors vying for the Oscar in the best foreign-language film category to discuss their craft at a symposium.

In light of Tehran's policy of no contact between its citizens and Israelis, there was some quiet concern that an incident might mar the occasion. Last week, an Iranian soccer team pulled out of a match with a Serbian team because the latter was coached by an Israeli, Avram Grant.

But before a full house at the Academy's Samuel Goldwyn Theater on Saturday, the directors faced the audience in a single row, flanking Mark Johnson, chair of the selection committee.

The directors were seated by the alphabetical order of their respective film titles: Bullhead by Belgium's Michael Roskam; Footnote by Israel's Joseph Cedar; In Darkness by Poland's Agnieszka Holland Monsieur Lazhar by Canada's Philippe Falardeau; and A Separation by Iran's Asghar Farhadi, who was accompanied by a translator.

During the two-hour panel discussion, Cedar and Farhadi did not speak to each other directly, but joined their colleagues in chuckling at each other's jokes and politely applauding their respective remarks.

The same applied when Holland discussed her film about a dozen Jews hiding in underground sewers during the Nazi occupation of Poland, a theme directly contradicting Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's insistence that the Holocaust never happened.

All of the panellists used hand-held microphones except for Cedar, whose stationery mike was fastened to the armrest of his chair, because of the Jewish Sabbath. The symposium is always held on the Saturday preceding the Sunday Academy Awards and Cedar, who is a Shabbat observer, walked two miles from his hotel to the theatre.

In 2007, when Cedar's war film Beaufort also was among the five finalists, he consulted his rabbi and was told that he could not use a mike during the symposium. As a result, only those in the first few rows could hear his remarks. This time Cedar consulted a different authority, who advised that the director could speak into a mike, as long as he did not actually hold it in his hand.

WikiLeaks: Israel destroyed Iranian nuclear installation

JTA

Stolen e-mails from a U.S. intelligence firm indicate that Israel has destroyed all Iranian nuclear infrastructures on the ground.

The e-mail from the Stratfor company, released by WikiLeaks on Monday, cited a "confirmed Israeli intelligence agent." It is one of five million e-mails that the anti-secrecy website plans to release in the coming days.

The e-mails are rumoured to have been hacked by the Anonymous hackers group, which has threatened in a YouTube video to launch cyber attacks on Israeli websites.

The Israel-Iran e-mail comes in the wake of a November 2011 explosion that killed 17 workers at an Iranian Revolutionary Guard base near Tehran, which Iran said was an accident.

"I think this is a diversion. The Israelis already destroyed the entire Iranian nuclear infrastructure on the ground weeks ago. The current 'let's bomb Iran' campaign was ordered by the EU leaders to divert the public attention from their at home financial problems," read the e-mail from the Israeli source. The operation was undertaken with the help of Kurdish rebels, according to the e-mail.

The Stratfor company said in a statement Monday that the e-mails published "may be forged or altered to include inaccuracies; some may be authentic."

Stratfor is a global security analysis company that has been likened to a shadow CIA. Its clients include American government agencies such as the Department of Homeland Security, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the Marine Corps, and the Dow Chemical Company.

A military strike of Iran's nuclear facilities would bring about "catastrophic" consequences, Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin wrote in a widely circulated article on Monday.

Vladimir Putin

Putin's comments weren't the first time Russian officials expressed opposition to the possibility of military action in Iran, with Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Gennady Gatilov saying last week that "any possible military scenario against Iran will be catastrophic for the region and for the whole system of international relations."

"Therefore I hope Israel understands all these consequences ... and they should also consider the consequences of such action for themselves," Gatilov said at a news conference.

In the article published on Monday, the Russian PM said that his country was "worried about the growing threat of a strike on Iran," adding: "If it happens, the consequences will be truly catastrophic. Their real scale is impossible to imagine."

He said that the international community must acknowledge Iran's right to conduct uranium enrichment in exchange for placing the program under close supervision by the UN nuclear watchdog.

Iran has insisted that its controversial uranium enrichment program is aimed at producing energy and medical isotopes, but the West believes it's a cover for developing nuclear weapons.

"The West has gotten carried away trying to 'punish' some nations," Putin said. "It reaches out for sanctions or even a military club at the drop of a hat."

He said the western emphasis on using force could encourage more countries to seek nuclear weapons in a bid to protect themselves.

Referring to Russia's rejection of UN action on the Syrian crisis, Putin said the West had backed the Arab Spring to advance its interests in the region, and that instead of promoting democracy, the revolts had given rise to religious extremism.

In the lengthy article, Putin defended the Russia-China decision last month to veto a UN resolution condemning Syrian President Bashar Assad's crackdown on protests, saying that Moscow wouldn't allow a replay of what happened in Libya, where NATO airstrikes helped Libya's rebels oust Moammar Gadhafi's regime.

In related news, United Nations nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), said in a report on Friday that Iran has tripled its capacity to enrich uranium to elevated levels.

Iran's enrichment of uranium of up to 20 per cent has caused concern in the West because it is theoretically much easier to turn such material into bomb-grade material than uranium enriched at below five per cent.

Iran has doubled the number of centrifuges for enriching to 20 per cent at its fortified underground site at Fordo, according to a report by the IAEA.

Iran has now made more than 100 kilograms of higher-enriched material, less than half the amount needed for a nuclear warhead, the document said.

Last week talks between the UN nuclear watchdog and Iran on an agreement to monitor the latter's nuclear program ended without progress. Negotiators for the IAEA left Iran, after two days of talks, and without being allowed to inspect the Parchin military base near Tehran, a military site thought to be used for explosives testing. The failure came in the wake of increasingly tough sanctions against Iran by the international community.

Last week, Iran sent a letter to European Foreign Policy chief Catherine Ashton saying it would bring new initiatives to the talks.

The Kosher Consumer Has A Choice

MAZEL WINES started in the 60's when it was all but impossible to purchase high quality Kosher wines in Toronto. Since then, owner and operator Mrs. Beila Adler, has fought and won the right to expand the selection and variety of wines that we enjoy today.

Providing the Jewish community with quality service, as well as quality product, is the Mazel Wines priority. With over 40 years of unique experience, educating the consumer is a responsibility they take very seriously. Mrs. Adler pulls out a creased piece of paper with a few typed sentences on it. "I read this somewhere, I can't recall where, but it has become our motto," she explains. It reads: "Excellence is more than just a word. It is a commitment in our relationship with our clients, our employees and our community. We strive to promote and encourage excellence within and beyond our company.

"If you make a simcha," Mrs. Adler says, "I will not just say, 'Go to the store and buy my wines.' No. You come here, we sit down with you." Mazel Wines has experts (and the expertise) to help not only select the appropriate wines and liquors, but also help plan the occasion, from picking the wines to choosing the after dinner liqueurs.

"As an established, registered agent," says Mrs. Adler, "we work together with the LCBO to have a sizable number of fine kosher wines and spirits available. This year for Purim and Pesach we have Les Floreales Moscato, rated best in quality and very competitively priced at $11.95. There's also Armon Kosher for Passover Vodka, and the Armon Cream Rose (9% alcohol content) is a fruity, mild wine that's perfect for the seder."

Although Mrs. Adler insists that her role is to help her customers enjoy the greatest selection and quality of wines available, her favourite role is in helping people by offering convenience and the benefit of her expertise. "We service our clients with the whole package, including purchasing all of the wines, liqueurs and liquor for their simcha. We are, in essence, a one-stop provider with the expertise to advise on what wine is best suited to the food being served and to advise on what quantities are needed."

Netanyahu will meet with community members

Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird and Finance Minister Jim Flaherty spent a week in Israel last month on a diplomatic mission.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said his organization was asked to brief both Canadian and Israeli officials "on the issues of the day, the political landscape and backdrop informing the situation at this particular juncture."

He also said he was "delighted" that Netanyahu had agreed to meet with about 60 community representatives on Sunday morning at an event that CIJA is arranging on behalf of the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa.

Fogel said there was a tremendous interest by the community to meet with Netanyahu and hear Israel's position on numerous topics.

He said members of Jewish federations across the country have been invited to the breakfast meeting, as have representatives of B'nai Brith Canada, Israel Bonds, the Jewish National Fund and other pro-Israel groups.

"Clearly, people are very anxious about the overall set of challenges facing Israel and are signalling their desire to connect both with the issues and the central personalities like Netanyahu, who can offer insight into where things are at and where they are going," Fogel said.

He concurred with MacDougall's assessment of the topics likely to be discussed by Harper and Netanyahu.

"The topic that will surely dominate the discussion is the threat posed by Iran, which continues its determined drive to acquire nuclear arms," Fogel said.

Other topics on the table will probably include the "deteriorating situation in the aftermath of the so-called Arab Spring" and "the growing influence of Hamas and Hezbollah on Israel's doorstep," he added.

"I imagine some attention will be given to the effort to reinvigorate the peace process with the Palestinians and, of course, the mutual desire to strengthen the [Canada-Israel] bilateral relationship across the spectrum of economic and social sectors."

Libel conviction of Israeli in al-Dura case overturned

PARIS — A French appeals court has overturned the libel conviction of an Israeli physician who was sued by the father of Mohammed al-Dura, the boy whose shooting death in September 2000 became a powerful symbol of the second intifadah.

Jamal al-Dura had displayed to international media outlets scars on his son's body he claimed were caused by bullets fired by Israel Defence Forces soldiers.

In a 2008 interview with a French Jewish weekly, an Israeli orthopedic surgeon, David Yehuda, disputed the elder Dura's claim. Yehuda said the scars were not related to the incident in which Mohammed, who was 12 years old, died.

Rather, Yehuda said, they were the result of an assault on Mohammed by Hamas militants who accused him of collaborating with Israel, as well as subsequent surgery performed by Yehuda himself in 1994.

Yehuda, together with the reporter and editor of the French publication, were convicted of libel by a French court in April and ordered to pay thousands of euros in compensation.

The ruling was the result of Yehuda's appeal of his conviction.

The photographs of the Duras, father and son, taking cover behind a barrel during an exchange of gunfire between Israeli forces and Palestinian militants, near the Netzarim junction in the Gaza Strip, remains one of the most enduring images of the second intifadah.

Israel initially apologized for the boy's death but issued a retraction when subsequent investigations indicated the boy was most likely killed by Palestinian fire.

Netanyahu accuses Abbas of incitement

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday harshly condemned Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas for a speech given at a conference in Qatar in which Abbas claimed that Israel is "trying to erase the Arab, Muslim and Christian nature of Jerusalem."

"This was a speech of severe incitement coming from the mouth of someone who supposedly claims that he seeks peace," a statement from Netanyahu's office said. "The time has come for the Palestinian leadership to stop denying the past and distorting reality. For thousands of years, Jerusalem has been the eternal capital of the Jewish people. Under Israeli sovereignty, Jerusalem will continue to be open to members of all faiths. There is complete freedom of worship for everyone and Israel will continue to devotedly protect the holy places of all religions."

In his speech, Abbas compared Israel's control of Jerusalem to the Roman and Crusader occupations of the city. Abbas cast doubt on the existence of the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem and accused Israel of trying to harm the al-Aqsa Mosque. He also called on Muslims from around the world to come to Jerusalem.

"Abbas knows well that there is no foundation for his allusions, including the baseless claims regarding the al-Aqsa Mosque," the statement from Netanyahu's office said. "Israel expects that someone who seemingly stands for peace will prepare his people for peace and coexistence and not spread lies and incitement."

Abbas asserted that Israel is using various means to conduct ethnic cleansing against the Arab residents of east Jerusalem.

"[Israel's] goal is to Judaize Jerusalem and position it as the capital of the occupation state," Abbas said.

Israel Briefs

Yeshiva exemption nixed

Israel's Tal Law, which allows yeshiva students to delay their military service, will have to be extended despite being declared unconstitutional, Israeli Interior Minister Eli Yishai said. Yishai, who is also the leader of the Shas Party, said the law will likely be extended for at least a year, until new legislation can be drafted. The Israeli Supreme Court last week deemed the law unconstitutional. The Tal Law, named for retired Supreme Court justice Tzvi Tal and enacted in 2002 under then-prime minister Ehud Barak, allows full-time yeshiva students to delay army service until age 23. At that time, students either can continue to study full time or perform a shortened army service or a year of national service. Afterward they can choose to join the workforce. The Knesset last week rejected two bills that would have required all Israeli citizens, including haredim, to serve in the military or national service.

Temple Mount riot

Police dispersed Muslim rioters on the Temple Mount who reportedly had been spurred by reports Jewish extremists planned to enter the site. Reports said the rioters, among the Friday worshippers at the site's mosques, hurled rocks at the Mughrabi Bridge entrance, prompting a rare incursion by police, who used stun grenades. At least 11 police and 15 rioters were hurt and four people were arrested.

Committee calls for dismantling conglomerates

Eran Azran
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The economic concentration committee delivered its final recommendations last week, which were stricter than the interim report delivered some months ago.

In contrast to that draft report, the committee recommended the Apax Partners fund and the Ofer family must choose finance holdings or industry. They are considered too big and influential to keep both.

Apax, an international investment fund, owns Tnuva, the biggest foods manufacturer in Israel, and Psagot, Israel's biggest investment house. The Ofers own interests in a slew of industries and in Bank Mizrahi-Tefahot.

The interim report had already singled out three tycoons – Nochi Dankner, Yitzhak Tshuva and Zadik Bino – as having to choose finance or non–finance (companies that provide goods or services). The addition of Apax and the Ofers, while short of a surprise, had not been obvious, but the committee tightened the criteria and they made the short list.

The chief problem with a huge business conglomerate owning both finance and non-finance companies is conflict of interests: the finance companies could lend to the goods and services firms based on the personal interests of the figure at the top of the pyramid, not necessarily in the companies' best interests. Also, the finance companies could deny credit to the real companies' rivals.

Tshuva is on the list for his holdings of Delek Group, which owns real estate and oil and gas exploration companies, the Phoenix Insurance Company and the Excellence-Nessuah Investment House.

The committee gave the affected groups four years to decide and sell assets.

Action needed on Israeli 'economic concentration'

Guy Rolnik
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

It took less than 10 years for the Israeli economy to become an atrophied, corrupt playing field for oligarchs.

But the downslide ground to a sudden halt when the prime minister, the governor of the Bank of Israel and the finance ministry stood before the people of Israel and categorically admitted the economy is concentrated in the extreme. This situation is harmful to freedom, competition, competitiveness, economic growth, wages and the very fabric of democracy itself.

Economic concentration means the economy is dominated by a handful of players who run things for their own benefit, not the public's.

Two years ago, the prime minister and the governor of the Bank of Israel decided to take action to pre-empt the final implosion of Israeli democracy while the leveraged tycoons danced into the night.

Predictably, the establishment of a committee to study concentration in the Israeli economy, reach conclusions and make recommendations encountered a belligerent campaign by most of Israel's newspapers and business editors. They set out to defend their bosses and milieu tooth and claw.

A year after the committee was set up, despite all the facts it had compiled, it seemed doomed.

And then came the grassroots upheaval. It began over the exorbitant price of cottage cheese, an Israeli favourite for breakfast, lunch and dinner. The phrase "economic concentration" began to be bandied about.

Gradually, politicians, academics and others found courage and began to speak out. The words "economic concentration," "monopolies" and "competition" became common parlance.

As the bandwagon gained momentum, more and more economists, academics and political leaders jumped on.

The composition of the committee, and the fact it did most of the job with haste after the summer protests shook up our leaders, means that not all Israel's structural ailments were addressed.

Economic concentration will not suddenly evaporate with the enactment of new laws. The committee's recommendations will be undergoing lots of corrections and changes in the months to come. That's the work of the Knesset.

Parliamentarians, aided by economists, business people and the public, must make their message crystal-clear: we believe in the free market and in entrepreneurship. We are committed to strengthening Israeli business and excellence. We will succumb neither to "social justice" populism nor to the fury of the tycoons. We shall stay focused on our mission to build a better economic structure, diversified and free. This is crucial to democracy, to true social justice and to equality of opportunity.

In the heart of a WarHorse

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Toronto-based actor Troy Feldman has done a lot of things. He's a breakdancer, parkour (urban acrobat) artist, acrobat and stuntman.

But the Hamilton native knows his latest role inside and out – literally. Feldman is performing the role of the horse's heart in the award-winning show WarHorse, playing at Princess of Wales Theatre in Toronto until June 30.

"It takes one actor who with a steel pole manipulates the head with cords and triggers on it," Feldman says. "Then me, I'm the heart. I control the front legs and the breathing, which is done through my own breathing and through the legs of the horse. Another actor is the hind."

WarHorse begins in England, at the start of World War I. Joey, the beloved horse of young Albert, is sold to the cavalry and shipped to France. Joey is soon caught up in enemy fire. Fate takes him on an extraordinary journey. Albert, never forgets Joey, and embarks on a treacherous mission to find his horse.

It takes three actors to manipulate each puppet horse. The puppets were created by Adrian Kohler and Basil Jones of Handspring Puppet Company. The horses are life-size and lightweight, yet very strong so that they can be ridden. Each horse's skeletal frame is made of cane and detailed with wood, elastic, leather and wire. Feldman's team rotates playing horses Joey, Topthorn and the German gun-team horses. He also plays a crow puppet.

Feldman was trained to manoeuvre the puppets especially for WarHorse; before this production, his closest role was some mascot work. Feldman enjoyed learning this new skill, which is constantly evolving for him and the other actors, six teams in all that perform within the horse puppets. Feldman says he strives each night for a perfect show, which he feels takes a lot of strength and endurance.

"When you get onstage, for me it is a bit harder to see because the head and mane is right in front of me. The hind has more vision. It is super important when you are in the horse to use your peripheral vision, because when you are in the horse it is teamwork. For example, the person playing the head is running backwards most of the time. He is the only one out of the horse, and he can see everything behind us as we are going forward."

In the starring role of Albert is Alex Furber. Also joining Feldman onstage in lead roles are Brad Rudy, Tamara Bernier-Evans, Steven Yaffee, Patrick Galligan, Melanie Doane and Richard McMillan, who Feldman worked with in Mirvish Production's Lord of the Rings.

Feldman's other theatrical offerings have included The Forbidden Phoenix; Off The Wall: A Soldier's Tale and Jesus Christ Superstar. His film credits are Score: A Hockey Musical, White Collar Criminals, Stepping Up 2 and Stuntman.

WarHorse is produced by the National Theatre of Great Britain, National Angels, Bob Boyett and David Mirvish. It is based on a novel by Michael Morpurgo and adapted by Nick Stafford, in association with Handspring Puppet Company

Passages: Irving Dobbs, actor, songwriter and insurance agent, died in Toronto on Feb. 14 at about 86 years of age.

Born in Toronto as the youngest of five children, Dobbs became smitten with acting as a child and never lost the bug. After serving in the Royal Canadian Air Force in World War II, he studied theatre at Columbia University in New York and saw as many Broadway shows as he could and took on some parts. Back in Toronto, he did some acting and directing but found he needed a steady job "to support my habit." He became an insurance broker as a "stop gap" measure but stayed at it for nearly 50 years.

Dobbs appeared in numerous productions of the Teatron Jewish Theatre Company, Encore Entertainment and other local companies, mostly amateur. Some of his songs were used in the 1976 film Goldenrod, and he received royalties whenever the movie aired on TV. Three years ago he released a CD, This Is Love: Songs of Irving Dobbs and Irving Berlin, featuring songs by both Irvings.

His last stage role was in the Teatron production Deceived last November. "Irving had a leading role in Deceived as Samuel Goldstein and, as usual, he shone in the part," said Teatron artistic director Ari Weisberg.

Human rights film festival focuses on Mideast

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The ninth annual Human Rights Watch Film Festival, sponsored by the Toronto International Film Festival, opened last week and runs until March 9 at the TIFF Bell Lightbox, 350 King St. W.

A sampler:

This is my Land ... Hebron, a film about a tinderbox in the West Bank, is scheduled to be screened on Monday, March 5 at 8 p.m.

A documentary on sex trafficking in the Muslim world and Israel, The Price of Sex, will be screened on Tuesday, March 6, at 8 p.m.

On a more general note, the three-decade civil war in Guatemala, the subject of Granito: How to Nail a Dictator, will be shown on Thursday, March 8, at 8 p.m.

Hebron, the only Palestinian town in the West Bank with a Jewish presence, is highly contested, a flashpoint in the Arab-Israeli conflict. Five to six hundred Jews, virtually all Orthodox, live here under the protection of the Israeli army and consider Hebron entirely theirs.

The 120,000 Palestinian inhabitants regard the Jewish settlers as interlopers and troublemakers.

The history of Jewish settlement in Hebron can be traced back to the biblical patriarch Abraham, but Arabs have invariably formed the majority of its population.

Sixty-seven Jews were murdered in Hebron in a pogrom in 1929, during the British Mandate, but their descendants returned after the Six Day War.

In 1994, a Jewish extremist living in the West Bank, Baruch Goldstein, killed 29 Arabs in the Tomb of the Patriarchs, touching off a chain reaction of Palestinian suicide bombings in Israel.

This is my Land, directed by Giulia Amati and Stephen Natanson, unfolds against this bitter backdrop.

Jewish residents contend that God promised Hebron to Jews. "Hebron is the heart of Israel, where it all began," says Sani Horowitz, likening its Palestinian inhabitants to a "swamp" and claiming they are merely "guests" here.

Miriam Grabovsky, a fellow settler, rejects the notion of a "Palestinian nation." David Wilder, a spokesperson for the settlers, warns that Palestinian terrorists are trying "to kill us."

Hamid Qawashmah, a Palestinian resident, fears that the Palestinians in Hebron's old quarter will be forced out, adding that 15,000 to 25,000 have already left. Still another Palestinian inhabitant laments that Arabs are denied freedom of movement.

Uri Avnery, a former Israeli parliamentarian and peace activist, claims Israel's most extreme settlers have congregated in Hebron. Gideon Levy, an Israeli journalist, says that Israel's occupation of the West Bank is at its most "brutal" here. Yehuda Shaul, an Israeli posted here as a soldier, says that Jews in Hebron receive preferential treatment.

This is my Land illustrates a truism: the struggle for the West Bank will be long and hard.

Since the fall of communism in eastern Europe, 1.5 million women have been trafficked into the global sex trade. Many have been forced into prostitution in brothels in the Middle East.

In The Price of Sex, Mimi Chakorova, a Bulgarian photojournalist, delves fearlessly and restlessly into this shameful phenomenon, which is driven by poverty, police corruption and the complicity of female recruiters. All too often, women are lured into sexual slavery on false pretenses.

Two of the prime destinations to which they are sent are Dubai and Turkey, where they struggle with a life of fear, shame and violence. Yet Israel also figures in the white slavery trade.

Interviewing women who have been duped and subjected to indignities, Charkova talks to a prostitute in Istanbul's red-light district who discloses she has serviced as many as 50 clients a day. The statistic boggles the imagination.

The Price of Sex underscores the fact that the liberation of eastern Europe from communism was an enabling force that has condemned countless women to a life of sexual servitude.

On Jan. 26, Efrain Rios-Montt, the former president of Guatemala, was indicted on charges of genocide and crimes against humanity for the role he played in the country's 36-year civil war.

He appears in Pamela Yates' Granito: How to Nail a Dictator, a film that documents the Guatemalan army's brutal campaign against Mayans.

Guatemala, an impoverished country torn by coups, launched the offensive to throttle an insurgency rooted in just demands for democratic and economic reforms. Granito is thus about collective memory and the pursuit of justice and human rights.

Antisemitism has a long history in Britain

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Antisemitism in the British isles has a long and inglorious history, preceding the expulsion of Jews from Britain in 1290.

Anthony Julius, a London-based lawyer, has immersed himself in this age-old topic and written a weighty tome on it. In Trials of the Diaspora: A History of Antisemitism in England (Oxford University Press), he explores this phenomenon by examining four varieties of Jew hatred.

The first variety, the antisemitism of defamation, expropriation, murder and expulsion, climaxed in the medieval era.

The second kind, literary antisemitism, reeks in the pages of literature down through the ages.

The modern antisemitism of insult and partial exclusion has been experienced by Jews since their readmission to Britain in the mid-17th century.

The latest configuration of antisemitsm treats Zionism and Israel as illegitimate.

Jews settled in Britain after the Norman conquest in 1066, but conditions for the Jewish community did not deteriorate until the mid-12th century.

Ernest Bevin

Oswald Mosley

Oliver Cromwell

As Julius writes: "In medieval England, Jews were defamed, their wealth was expropriated, they were killed and injured, they were subjected to discriminatory and humiliating regulation, and they were, finally expelled."

The expulsion of Jews from Britain was preceded by their removal from towns such as Bury St. Edmunds in 1190 and Newcastle and Warwick in 1234.

"England, last among the nations of western Europe to receive Jews, was the first to expel them," Julius observes. "The expulsion was welcomed as a precedent by later generations of antisemites in other countries."

Curiously enough, literary antisemitism emerged after Jews were expelled and no longer were permitted to live in Britain. By the time Jews returned 400 years later, British literature had stereotyped them.

Geoffrey Chaucer's The Canterbury Tales was rife with derogatory references to Jews. William Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice perpetuated vile antisemitic myths. Thomas Nash's The Unfortunate Traveller underscored Jewish depravity. Charles Dickens' Oliver Twist drew attention to an unsavoury Jewish character, Fagin.

Anthony Trollope's novel The Prime Minister introduced the quintessential Jewish villain, Ferdinand Lopez, who "knows how to look and talk like a gentleman and claims to be one, but is soon revealed to be nothing but a Jew adventurer – a stranger … a schemer, a cajoling bully, a speculator, a swindler, a liar and a cheat."

Jews were readmitted to Britain by Oliver Cromwell, even though merchants and clerics voiced strong objections, fearing competition.

During the post-Cromwell period, Jews were subjected to ridicule in pamphlets, petitions, newspaper articles and satirical prints and cartoons.

But as Julius points out, philosemitism was also an element in public discourse about Jews.

The burning issue in the mid-19th century was whether a politician elected to the House of Commons could take his seat without swearing an oath on the true faith as a Christian.

The issue was finally resolved in 1858 when Lionel Rothschild, a newly elected member of parliament and a member of a famous banking dynasty, was not compelled to utter fidelity to Christianity upon taking his seat.

Rothschild's supporters hailed his admission to the House of Commons as a victory over religious persecution and bigotry. Detractors warned that the campaign for emancipation was a talmudic plot.

Benjamin Disraeli, a convert to Christianity and the first person of Jewish descent to become prime minister, faced taunts throughout his distinguished career. In attacking him, some antisemites referred to his "crypto-Judaism" and "Judaic feeling." One opponent wrote, "Mr. Disraeli is a Jew by birth and a Christian by accident."

The Aliens Act of 1905, supported by no less a person than Arthur Balfour, whose name is affixed to the 1917 Balfour Declaration, was designed to exclude "undesirable aliens" from Britain. Although the word "Jew" appeared nowhere in the legislation, Julius notes, it was widely understood that Jews would be disproportionately affected by the xenophobic measure.

The 1917 Bolshevik Revolution in Russia had unintended consequences in Britain, he says. Antisemites perceived it as a Judaeo-Bolshevik conspiracy, and in Palestine, British officials tended to equate communism with Zionism.

As the eminent British historian A.J.P. Taylor has acknowledged, postwar antisemitism was endemic, excluding Jews from social clubs and corporate boards and limiting their access to private schools.

The antisemitism that pervaded the era from the 1920s to the '40s was "deep and broad," bearing the weight of the preceding half-century of antisemitic practice, observes Julius.

Singling out the most vociferous antisemites of that period, he mentions unreconstructed racists such as Oswald Mosley of the British Union of Fascists, the Conservative party parliamentarian Maule Ramsay and the agitator Arnold Leese. The latter, a veterinary surgeon who founded an outfit known as the Imperial Fascist League, promoted the concept of blood libel and even called for genocide.

The troubles in Palestine following World War II – the bombing of the King David Hotel and the hanging of two British soldiers, to name but two salient incidents – generated a wave of antisemitism in Britain.

Synagogues were damaged, Jewish-owned shops were smashed and Jewish cemeteries were desecrated. Britain's foreign secretary, Ernest Bevin, admitted that "anti-Jewish feeling" was "greater" than it had been in a century.

The commander of British military forces in Palestine, Gen. Evelyn Barker, was more explicit. In a reference to "these bloody Jews," he wrote, "Yes, I hate the lot – whether they be Zionists or not."

Julius also documents the activities of the notorious neo-Nazi John Tyndall, who described Jews as "cancerous microbes."

His chapter on antisemitism and anti-Zionism is instructive. Criticism of Israeli policy is perfectly acceptable and legitimate, he suggests. But when Israel's very existence is denied, a red line has been crossed.

In summation, Julius says that while British Jews are secure today, contemporary antisemitism should be regarded as "an elusive, low-key affair, perhaps best understood as an antisemitism of minor, uneven inhibition on Jewish ambition and self-esteem."

It is, he claims, "a story of snub and insult, sly whisper and innuendo, deceit and self-deception."

Not a pretty picture.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Mark Breslin brings edge to Canada's comedy scene

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

He single-handedly revolutionized the comedy scene in this country.

"We brought Jewish American comedy to Canada," said Mark Breslin, the founder and chief executive officer of Canada's largest comedy club chain, Yuk Yuk's, which marked its 35th anniversary last year.

Before Breslin shook up Canada with his brand of cutting humour, standup comedians tended to be relatively timid and rarely, if ever, did they stray beyond the accepted red lines.

"Comedy in Canada was polite and sedate," said Breslin, who opened the first Yuk Yuk's in the basement of a community centre in Toronto in June 1976. "It lacked an edge."

Influenced by such iconic figures as Lenny Bruce and Mort Sahl, Breslin encouraged his comedians to venture into uncharted territory, tell titillating jokes turning on personal confession, sex, drugs and the like and thereby shatter social conventions.

A standup comedian himself, he was guided by two objectives: to build a comedy club network and to remain uncensored

"We found the audience we wanted," said Breslin, who celebrates his 60th birthday in May. "Young, hip and somewhat anti-establishment, which is what our comedy is all about."

No topic was beyond the pale. "If it was a good joke, it stayed in," he said.

Having tapped into a niche market, Yuk Yuk's prospered. "We were packed from the very beginning, though we weren't always financially viable," he said in an interview in a midtown café.

After moving to its first permanent location on Bay Street in 1978, Yuk Yuk's expanded beyond Toronto, opening a branch in Ottawa. Buoyed by its success, Breslin opened eight more clubs in the next three years. "It was quite an expansion," he noted.

There are 17 Yuk Yuk's clubs in Canada today, stretching from St. John's to Vancouver. Though franchised, he owns the intellectual property rights to the name and format.

Mark Breslin

At one point, he expanded into the United States, setting up branches in upstate New York – Buffalo and Rochester – and in Maui, Hawaii (where he lived for eight months).

Breslin launched Yuk Yuk's by chance.

After graduating from York University with a BA degree in English literature, he was at a loss, not knowing what to do.

But he knew his degree would not take him far. "It prepared me to work for a taxi company," he quipped.

Certainly, he was not interested in joining his father, Ruben, an entrepreneur in the garment district who made shirts and then switched into the nursing home business.

Nor was he certain whether he should continue his studies at the postgraduate level. The uncertainty vanished after Harbourfront hired him as its director of theatre and music. Yet two years later, he was out of a job.

"I was fired," he said, explaining that his position was eliminated by cutbacks. "I fell into Yuk Yuk's after finding myself unemployed."

Breslin did not know much about show business, but he knew that his future was in comedy.

The comedians he had worked with and befriended at Harbourfront were chafing at the bit, eager to do something different. They wanted to try out daring, racy jokes that management had discouraged and that Second City, a comedy club that preceded Yuk Yuk's, was also wary of.

Breslin approached a friend who happened to be wealthy and asked him whether it would be a good idea to start an edgier version of Second City.

"You have a business here," the friend said after duly considering the concept. He arranged financing, and Yuk Yuk's was born.

With Breslin doing double duty as host and comedian, Yuk Yuk's was a popular attraction. But after the Globe and Mail published a story about it on its front page, Breslin never looked back. "I was turning away hundreds of people at the door," he recalled.

As he discovered to his chagrin, comedians could be unreasonably demanding and jarringly vain. As he put it, "The comedy industry is a viper's pit due to clashing egos."

Yuk Yuk's "graduates" are household names today: Jim Carrey, Howie Mandel, Rick Moranis, Russell Peters, Mike Buller, Jeremy Hotz and Harland Williams.

Sizing up his "graduates," he observed, "Carrey was young, but old school. Mandel would do anything for a laugh. Peters revitalized race in comedy. Hotz is the best standup comedian since Jack Benny. Williams exhibited pure, child-like wonder. Buller, in his improvised banter, was razor sharp."

Breslin's latest crop of comedians, including Jessica Holmes and Sam Kinison, are featured in a new boxed set of DVDs. Road Warriors and Rarities is written and narrated by Breslin and distributed by Harper Audio Canada.

When Breslin launched Yuk Yuk's, Jewish comedians were omnipresent in Canada. But with Jewish talent having largely migrated to the United States, Jews no longer dominate the Canadian club scene.

In his judgment, Woody Allen was probably the most important comedian in the second half of the 20th century, filling the shoes of Charlie Chaplin, who dominated the first half. "He brought a whole new level of intellectualism to the business that didn't exist before. And he made comedy extremely personal."

Breslin also admires Jack Benny's subtlety, Joan Rivers' fearlessness and vulnerability and Lenny Bruce's cleverness. But he was never an admirer of Myron Cohen's 1950s ethnic jokes, and he believes that Jackie Mason peaked in the 1990s.

To Breslin, great comedians share three qualities. They rock to their own rhythm. They have superior writing skills. They display an exaggerated personality flaw that becomes endearing.

Breslin is in charge of Humber College's comedy program, the only one of its kind in the world. He founded it, sits on its advisory board and is its producer in residence. "It's a very gratifying job," he said. But it bothers him that some of Humber's most talented graduates are either underemployed or unemployed.

Breslin, though, has no trouble keeping busy.

A television producer whose credits include Late Night with Joan Rivers, Friday Night with Ralph Benmergui and, most recently, Kenny vs. Spenny, he has also appeared on radio (Live from Yuk Yuk's and Laugh Attack).

Apart from having written several books – Zen and Now and Control Freaked, among others – he writes a monthly comedy column for the Village Post and reviews films for Metro.

But his most outstanding achievement may be his one-year-old son, Jackson, whom he fathered with his wife, Karina Lemke, a wedding planner and florist. "Jackson is named for Jackson Pollock, the abstract painter. I'm hoping he makes a revolutionary mess like his namesake."

Gary Carter remembered

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

Former Montreal Expos great Gary Carter's death from cancer Feb. 16 at only 57 was not unexpected, but the news still rattled Jewish fans, friends and those who were ardent followers of the "Kid" during his decade in Montreal.

Including this one.

At the time of his diagnosis last May, Johnny Elias, a friend for 35 years from the time Carter was a fixture at Elias' long defunct Grand Slam Baseball School in Cote St. Luc, expressed shock at the news.

Now, according to Cote St. Luc city councillor Mike Cohen, fellow councillor Allan Levine is considering tabling a proposal to have a field in CSL's Kirwin Park, where Grand Slam was located, renamed after Carter.

"I mean, 57 years old," Elias said last May at the time of Carter's diagnosis. "It's frightening."

Right. That's my age, too, and if there's one thing you get to know in life, it's that you never know.

Comment

Elias, who hosted Carter's 2003 Baseball Hall of Fame induction and received annual greetings from the former all-star catcher, told The CJN on Feb. 17, a day after Carter's death, that he had seen his old friend and chatted with him just one month earlier at a fundraiser for autistic children in West Palm Beach, Fla.

"I considered him, a good, good friend," said Elias, who also spent years pitching batting practice for the Expos.

"We spoke, but he did not look well or feel well at all," Elias said in a call from Hallandale, Fla.

Elias recalled how at Grand Slam, Carter took the trouble to go over to, and speak for a full five minutes with, a young boy who seemed unhappy.

"I just couldn't believe how he went over to someone he had never met before to do that," Elias recalled. "Gary would bring bats, balls, equipment to the school. He was there every summer for 11 years."

Carter also never let Elias forget that Elias left Shea Stadium in New York to return to Canada late in Game 6 of the 1986 World Series between the New York Mets and Boston Red Sox, when Carter played a decisive role in helping the New York Mets come back to win one of the greatest World Series games of all time. Elias said that Carter and Andre Dawson, the two Expos in the Hall of Fame, "were definitely the two greatest players the team ever had."

Gary Carter in the Baseball Hall of Fame

Like everyone else, I remember Carter vividly, because during his decade in Montreal (1974-84), plus one more season in 1992, when he was 38, Carter was ever the exuberant, gung-ho player, always grinning and friendly.

He had a bullet arm from the plate, he had power, he had swagger. And he had the numbers. But then-owner Charles Bronfman reportedly never liked the fact he allowed Carter to sign a multi-year contract paying him more than $1 million per year – chump change by today's standards.

Carter competed 1,000 per cent, even when his knees were so ground down from the catcher's crouch that they seemed to buckle beneath him.

Critics, however, thought he was a bit of a hot dog, and Elias said some teammates resented him for "never saying no to a media interview request." "But that was the real Gary Carter," Elias said.

And it's true: what you saw was what you got. Carter was always his authentic self, the real deal.

"He was Mr. Baseball," Mark Routtenberg, who was part of a local consortium of Expos owners during the 1990s, including during Carter's last year, told The CJN from Florida.

Routtenberg got to know Carter fairly well, and they played golf together occasionally, but they didn't really socialize. Routtenberg remembered him as a man who never refused a request from a charity, who went to hospitals or schools any time he was asked, to meet fans and speak about the game he loved.

"I was just a fan in those days, and French-Canadians loved him," Routtenberg said. "He learned [some] French. He was the star. He never wanted to leave Montreal and was just a great guy."

Routtenberg said he last chatted with Carter a few months before his diagnosis. For me, Carter's death also hit home for personal reasons. In 1981, when my older sister had a recurrence of cancer that would take her life a little more than a year later, it was Carter, upon request, who with his teammates autographed a baseball for her. She had a major crush on Carter, and I still have the baseball she cherished, with his signature standing out – just like he did.

Braun wins drug test appeal

JTA

NEW YORK — Milwaukee Brewers outfielder Ryan Braun won his appeal of his earlier positive test for performance-enhancing drugs.

The decision, announced on Feb.23, means that Braun – the reigning National League most valuable player and the first Jew to earn that distinction in nearly five decades – will avoid a 50-game suspension.

Braun's suspension was overturned by an arbitrator. It's believed to be the first time a baseball player has successfully challenged a drug-related grievance.

No reasoning for the ruling was given, but the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel reported that the 2-1 ruling by the arbitration panel hearing Braun's case turned on a technicality related to the timeliness of his drug test being passed to a testing lab.

In December, it was reported that Braun, the son of an Israeli-born father and Catholic mother, had tested positive for elevated testosterone levels. Braun denied using performance-enhancing drugs.

"I am very pleased and relieved by today's decision," Braun said in a statement reported by news agencies. "It is the first step in restoring my good name and reputation. We were able to get through this because I am innocent and the truth is on our side."

Rob Manfred, Major League Baseball's vice-president for labor relations, said his organization "vehemently disagrees with the decision."

Tikkun olam drives author's private detective Jonah Geller

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Jonah Geller, 34, is six feet tall, weighs 185 pounds and is very fit. Sporting a black belt in karate, he is a keen student of krav maga, the martial arts technique pioneered and developed in Israel.

Licensed as a private investigator in Toronto, this former Israeli army soldier owns the World Repairs Agency, named after the Jewish tradition of tikkun olam, or repairing the world one step at a time.

Geller, raised in Toronto's Bathurst Manor neighbourhood, is a figment of the imagination of Howard Shrier, a former newspaper reporter born in Montreal.

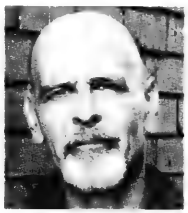
Last month, Shrier's third Jonah Geller crime novel, Boston Cream (Vintage Canada), was published, having been preceded by Buffalo Jump (2008) and High Chicago (2009). Shrier's first two mystery books won Arthur Ellis Awards for excellence in Canadian crime writing, making him the only Canadian author ever to win two such prizes in a row. He is currently working on his fourth Geller novel, Miss Montreal, which is due in the spring of 2013.

The Geller novels already in print are now in development as a television series for CTV. "I'm not writing the pilot," he said, noting that a fellow graduate of Montreal's Herzliah High School, Avrum Jacobson, got the assignment. "But I'm keeping a close eye on it and consulting as needed," he added. Shrier – whose stand-alone novel, Lostport, was published as an e-book last year – started the first Geller novel in the summer of 2003 while vacationing at his Georgian Bay cottage.

"I began the book partly because I had run out of things to read," he explained. "But mostly because I had been reading crime fiction for years and thought it was time I tried writing one in earnest."

A big fan of the genre since his early 20s, Shrier honed his taste for it on the classic private eye novels of Dashiell Hammett, Raymond Chandler and especially Ross Macdonald, all of whom were strong influences. Subsequently, he delved into the novels of Robert Crais and Dennis Lehane. His favourite crime writer is Elmore Leonard, whose best book, he claims, is Glitz.

Before writing Buffalo Jump, Shrier got as far as turning out four chapters of a crime novel. "What helped this time was that the initial premise just wouldn't let go: what if a hit man were given a job he didn't want to do because it involved a child the same age as his son, and what if he needed a private investigator to find out who ordered the contract so he could convince them to leave out the kid?"



Howard Shrier

Obsessed with the plot, and confident of his ability to research and write the story, Shrier finished his first Geller novel four years later.

Jewish references are sprinkled throughout the Geller novels. "From the very beginning, Jonah speaks of his desire to commit acts of tikkun olam, he said. "Many of the people who hire him are Jewish, having heard of him through the community or his family." In Boston Cream, a rabbi and his daughter are among the lead characters, he pointed out.

Prior to embarking on a career as a crime writer, Shrier spent years as a specialist in corporate and government communications and in freelance journalism.

"I was a seasoned, disciplined writer, used to deadlines. The transition to novelist was not so difficult. The hardest transition was probably financial. My income in the first year dropped from $90,000 to $9,000."

Some publishers rejected Buffalo Jump, but Anne Collins, an editor at Random House, liked it and offered him a two-book deal. "I feel very fortunate to have been able to make the leap from corporate life to fiction writing," said Shrier, who teaches writing at the University of Toronto's School of Continuing Studies. "The job I had was interesting, secure, well-paying, but it wasn't satisfying on deeper levels. With my family's support, I took the plunge, and have been rewarded in work that demands the very best of me."

A Concordia University graduate in journalism and creative writing whose first paid position was as a CJAD Radio news writer in Montreal, Shrier worked as a crime reporter for the now-defunct Montreal Star from April 1979 until it folded less than six months later.

Asked how many more crime novels he intends to produce, he replied, "I'm not sure. It depends on whether Random House wants more and on other projects I have in mind. But I love Jonah and want to stay with him as long as possible."

FCancer educates Generation Y

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Yael Cohen, 25, knew she was onto something when a T-shirt she made for her mother, who was battling breast cancer, elicited hugs from complete strangers.

"The T-shirt was meant to be something [my mother] wore in private as a source of strength, but being the dynamite she is, she wore it everywhere," Cohen said. "Peoples' reactions were unbelievable. She couldn't walk a block without high fives, hugs, stories and tears."

Cohen said she always jokes "that it takes a hell of a lot for a stranger to hug another stranger in our society, and I knew we had something powerful that really resonated when strangers hugged mom. And I wanted to do something good with it. The movement grew very organically into what it is today. What started as a T-shirt is now so much more."

The T-shirt that Cohen made for her mother after her first surgery read "Fuck Cancer." It created "an overwhelming response to anyone who saw it," which in turn sparked Cohen, founder of a Vancouver-based charity called FCancer, to share the message.

Cohen is on a mission to educate young people about the early warning signs of cancer and inspire them to spread the word.

Founded in 2009, FCancer is the first and only Canadian cancer charity focused primarily on early detection education, she said.

FCancer's mission is to actively engage Generation Y (17- to 35-year-olds) and equip them with the information they need to make a difference. Since 90 per cent of all cancers are curable if detected in stage one, Cohen said she believes FCancer will save lives.

"FCancer is creating a generation of early detection ambassadors who, by learning about what to do to stay healthy, what to watch out for, and what questions to ask, are taking control of their health and the health of their parents."

Cohen said she started FCancer because Generation Y is "the generation of instant gratification and quizzical suspicion. If we can't do or see it being done, you're hard pressed to make us believe. I realized that if I can make curing cancer active rather than passive, we just might stand a chance. To me, this is really positive news. It puts the power back in our hands. It gives us a call to action, which my generation thrives on."

To date, FCancer has raised nearly $1 million. "I think it's brought attention to itself. People gravitate to movements like ours that are authentic, passionate and transparent," said Cohen, who was the only Canadian speaker at the 2010 White House Next Generation Leadership Conference.

Most recently, FCancer won $25,000 in the Mozilla Firefox Challenge. With the support of One Tree Hill actor Sophia Bush, the charity was able to raise more than $117,000 for early cancer detection education, making the total winning amount $142,000.

The month-long holiday fundraising contest put several celebrity-backed charities in competition to raise awareness and funds for social and humanitarian causes. Aside from FCancer, the top contenders included Seth Rogen for Hilarity for Charity, Edward Norton for the Maasai Wilderness Conservation and Jonah Hill for Nothing But Nets.

The competition was tight, but FCancer narrowly beat Rogen, who finished second by a difference of less than $5,000.

"We are so thrilled to have won the Mozilla Firefox Challenge," said Cohen. "The really remarkable thing is that thousands of people contributed to our win, and those thousands of people helped fully fund FCancer for 2012. We now enter the new year free to dedicate every minute to creating and implementing the most revolutionary early detection campaigns we can imagine."

Bush is on FCancer's board of advisers. Her mother, like Cohen's, is a cancer survivor who attributes her recovery to early detection.

"Sophia and I were on the phone screaming with excitement in the middle of the night when they put the winner title up," Cohen said.

In targeting young people, FCancer takes a unique approach. "We talk to the youth. This is big. Too few talk to the youth about cancer because we're not in the highest risk demographic and we certainly aren't the large donors. This is a huge mistake. We teach them how to use their phones, program their PVR and how to balance their diets, so why don't we teach them something that can actually save their lives?"

Generation Y has "an unprecedented sense of responsibility to teach their parents," Cohen said. "My generation teaches their parents more than any generation ever has. Teaching is the best way to learn, so by teaching our parents, you bet we're learning, too, and by the time we're at the age in the highest risk demographic, we'll be looking for cancer instead of just finding it."

Cohen said FCancer goes online and uses "edgy, funny and provocative campaigns to break through to the media-saturated generation. This is another thing that sets us apart. Marketing is an invaluable tool to getting people to take action. Our campaigns aim to let people interact with cancer on a different level, through humour and raw emotion."

At FCancer, "we often talk about the fact that when you've lost your sense of humour, you've really lost it all. If someone is actually interested in and excited about what they're learning, they're going to remember it, and share it with their network. What better way to interact with Gen Y than by using humour and wit?"

Cohen said she's learned that the supporters with the most to laugh about are actually those who have gone through cancer themselves. "They're sick of the pity, the sad looks, or the expectation that they're meant to say certain things or act in a specific way. Instead of expecting them to be gracious and humble, Fuck Cancer opens up a realm which lets them get pissed off, or even find something absolutely hilarious about the situation."

Many of the earliest warning signs of cancer are seemingly benign and highly embarrassing, Cohen said. "Most people won't talk about uncomfortable early warning signs like nipple leakage, bloating, or painful ejaculation, but they will joke about them, which opens the door to education and conversation. To make a real change, we have to be interested and engaged."

Going forward, Cohen said she hopes FCancer can continue to grow and educate. "We are going to be the generation that puts an end to late-stage cancer diagnosis. In the same way there have been paradigm shifts in how people perceive drinking and driving, smoking and global warming, this movement will flip the switch on how we think of cancer."

Bialik students race for zero waste

It seems I need to be constantly ready to have a meaningful discussion on sustainability practices within the Jewish community. You never know how and where the topic could come up.

I recently attended a bar mitzvah at Congregation Beth Torah in Toronto. I spoke with David Young, an acquaintance of mine going back many years and currently the cantor at the synagogue, about the recent renovations that the synagogue had undergone.

As we discussed some of the points around the renovation and the abundance of natural light, which was being used to illuminate the banquet hall where we were eating, I was reintroduced to his wife, Beverley, who is vice-principal of the senior division (grades 6-8) at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Beverley asked me about my interest in conservation and sustainable operations of synagogues. She then brought me up to date on some of the sustainability efforts she and her team have been spearheading at Bialik, currently a gold-level certified Ontario EcoSchool.

Similar to other Toronto Jewish day schools, Bialik recognized the need to improve the existing program by getting students more involved and moving toward a more visible and measurable effort.

Bialik saw the opportunity of using the leadership potential of their older students to raise the consciousness of the younger students in the school. They created a year-long friendly inter-school and inter-grade challenge called the Race for Zero Waste. In their capacity as student leaders, all senior division students have the opportunity, on a monthly rotation, to be involved in shaping the program, participate in its rollout, and to grow personally as they mentor their younger counterparts in junior kindergarten through Grade 5.

The Race for Zero Waste aims to reduce the measurable volume of waste leaving the school. Working with the school's waste-management company, the students determined the current volume of waste and used that as a benchmark to measure the improvements they were able to influence.

The key to the effort was to reduce the amount of waste produced at the school while making sure that the school was taking advantage of the recycling programs in which the waste management company participates.

To reduce the amount of waste, student leaders encourage waste-free lunches. This did not mean stuffing the waste into the student's lunch bag and taking it home for disposal, which would have meant shifting the waste problem from the school to the home.

Students and their parents are encouraged to put their lunches into reusable containers and to reduce the number of plastic water bottles leaving the school for recycling by using refillable water bottles.

These ideas and more are being shared with the Etzion Gaver School in Eilat. More about that in next month's column.

An update:

- Kavana Gardens was recently selected for funding by the Six Points Venture Philanthropy effort.
- ZooShare won Toronto's Climatespark competition in which Robbins Hebrew Academy and Leo Baeck Day School were top 10 finalists

I love you

I was going to write about middle names. Then I met the kid who wasn't loved enough.

And I wanted to tell you, you can never love enough, and if you've been thinking you could be doing a better job loving your kids, loving yourself, loving your neighbours, then do so.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

The kid told me his parents are fulsome and fussy, to everyone but him. He said that behind closed doors, they sour on him and act as if he was mistakenly present. A smile to strangers. A nasty face to kin. That's familial thievery. And they forget it's not their friends who will wheel them when they're getting on. They forget they must show love to get love.

The young boy's older brother punches him when he gets home, and his parents say little, because the older brother is the "special one."

The kid teared up. "I want to be loved," he tells me. "Why don't they like me?"

How does that work? He's from her womb. He's his seed. It seems, we must reject our own. I guess we are nature. Maybe we should start giving examples from people to prove things about animals.

Non-special kids know they are. And beatings hurt. "It's only bruises," he said.

There is a Somali proverb that states: the last camel in line walks as quickly as the first. Which means, what happens to the least of us, has an effect on all of us. How can the Toronto Jewish community help this family? How can everyone help?

We must all learn how to express our love in a way that it is clearer, in a way that will circulate. To achieve this, sensitivity and appreciation between denominations is paramount, as is a personal journey into our own behaviour.

Every child must know he or she is cared for and that someone recognizes the uniqueness of his/her soul. When did you last hold your child, look him or her in the eyes and say, "You are my gem, and I thank God every day you are mine." When was the last time you paraded your child's gift in his/her eyes, invested in it, and helped your child nurture it? When did you do the same for yourself? "What a gift I am to me."

We have more than 100 shuls in Toronto and many schools. We have programs, places to buy Judaica and men who write Torahs. All of those, all of them, exist to show love for our neighbours, kids and ourselves. All of them exist in the humanist, secular, Reform, Conservative, Orthodox and haredi communities. All of them are worthless if they do not encourage kindness, authenticity and genuine love, particularly for our children, particularly for ourselves. This applies to all religions, to all communities.

Figuring you're doing your best is like loving a child by mistake. It doesn't work that well. It's like the kid who grabbed my hand at the video store instead of his mom's. He knew I was the stranger. He felt it in his fingers, on his knuckles, in his palm. He pulled away.

Hold your child close. Listen to your child. Learn how to show him/her you. If you've never said, "I love you," say it. Esther loved the Jewish people. Mordechai loved Esther.

I was going to write about middle names, then I met this kid who wasn't loved enough.

Netanyahu, Harper bask in friendship

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu arrived in Canada last Friday for meetings with senior government officials and, as expected, Iran dominated the agenda.

At a March 2 press conference in Ottawa, Prime Minister Stephen Harper welcomed his Israeli counterpart back to Canada. Netanyahu was last in the country in May 2010, but had to cut his trip short when the Israeli navy caused an international incident after boarding the Gaza-bound ship Mavi Marmara and killing nine armed activists.

Harper expressed "pleasure" at Netanyahu's return, and the Israeli prime minister said he had "warm feelings" for Canada and its support of his country on the world stage.

The two then spoke briefly to reporters about topics they planned to discuss over the weekend, and took questions.

Both men said they looked forward to talking about strengthening and expanding trade and economic relations, as well as collaborative initiatives in the fields of science and technology.

But Netanyahu said Iran and its "relentless pursuit" of nuclear weapons were foremost on his mind.

While acknowledging that the best way to resolve the Iranian question would be through peaceful means, Netanyahu said Tehran has historically proven that it is willing to exploit diplomatic channels to deceive and delay until it achieved its goals. He said this time around, it could use the same strategy to "get to the nuclear finish line by running out the clock."

The international community shouldn't let this happen, he said, adding that "all options should be left on the table" to prevent Iran from advancing its nuclear program.

He called on the nations of the world to clearly demand that Iran dismantle its underground nuclear facility in Qom, stop uranium enrichment and "get rid" of all its fissile material.

Netanyahu said that as Israel's prime minister, it's his duty to convince the world of the Iranian threat.

Asked whether Canada would support a unilateral Israeli preemptive military strike against Iran, Harper said that while he believes Tehran would be a danger to the world if it acquired nuclear weapons, Canada "would like to see a peaceful resolution to the situation."

Regarding a hypothetical Israeli strike on Iran, Harper said that Canada would "of course recognize the right of Israel to defend itself as a sovereign Jewish state. But we support exploring every avenue to make sure a peaceful resolution is possible."

Ex-CICer Named

OTTAWA — A Liberal Party researcher who was behind an anonymous Twitter account that released details of Public Safety Minister Vic Toews' divorce was also a former head of the defunct Canada-Israel Committee's Pacific region office. In addition to having worked for CIC in Vancouver before it was absorbed in a Jewish communal reorganization by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, Adam Carroll also worked for a number of Liberal MPs in Ottawa. He resigned his party job last week after being named as the source of the account.

Shoah Mall Protest

PRAGUE — Opponents of a proposed shopping centre to be built on the site where Jews were deported to Nazi death camps want to ensure an appropriate monument is also erected. Protesters wearing yellow Stars of David and pushing empty shopping carts met Feb. 27 at the site in Prague where construction on the controversial shopping centre is set to begin. The protesters are wary of a pledge by the United Kingdom-based developer Lordship to build a monument to the Jewish transport victims who left from the site and also want to ensure that the monument will be dignified.

Jewish School Plays

HOUSTON — A Texas athletic league reversed course and rescheduled tournament games to enable an Orthodox Jewish day school, the Robert M. Beren Academy of Houston, to compete. The Texas Association of Private and Parochial Schools, known as TAPPS, decided March 1 to reschedule a state boys' basketball tournament semifinal so that Beren Academy could play without violating Shabbat. The game had been scheduled for last Friday night, but instead was played in the afternoon. The decision came just hours after the announcement that the team captain, along with teammates and parents, had filed a lawsuit against TAPPS and the Mansfield Independent School District, whose facilities are hosting the semifinals and finals of the tournament. TAPPS had previously rejected two appeals from Beren to reschedule the game The final was originally set for 2 p.m. Saturday, which also conflicts with Shabbat. In a statement, TAPPS said that when the Beren Academy met with the TAPPS board in 2009 to discuss membership, it was told tournament games are played on Friday and Saturday, and that the school's athletic director said he "understood."

Daniel Pearl 'Baptized' in Mormon Ritual

Daniel Pearl

NEW YORK — Daniel Pearl was baptized in a Mormon proxy ritual in another case of a prominent deceased Jew discovered to have been baptized posthumously in recent weeks.

Pearl, a Wall Street Journal reporter kidnapped and executed by terrorists in Pakistan in February 2002, was baptized by proxy last June at a Mormon temple in Idaho, the Boston Globe reported. The rite was revealed by Helen Radkey, an ex-church member who now works to reveal such activity.

The discovery came shortly after it was found that the parents of Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal were posthumously baptized. Last month, Anne Frank was posthumously baptized, and the names of the father and grandfather of Shoah survivor and author Elie Wiesel were found to have been submitted for proxy baptism.

Pearl's parents, Judea and Ruth, said it was "disturbing" to learn of the proxy baptism. "To them we say we appreciate your good intentions, but rest assured that Danny's soul was redeemed through the life that he lived and the values that he upheld," the Pearls said. "He lived as a proud Jew, died as a proud Jew and is currently facing his creator as a Jew, blessed, accepted and redeemed. For the record, let it be clear: Danny did not choose to be baptized, nor did his family consent to this uncalled-for ritual."

Cotler rejects 'Israeli apartheid' – in South Africa

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As activists on campuses around the world demonize Israel as an "apartheid state," Liberal MP Irwin Cotler made the case for Israel as a bastion of human rights in the very place apartheid was practised – South Africa.

Meeting with senior cabinet ministers, judges, NGOs and members of civil society, the former justice minister rejected the allegation Israel practices racial exclusion that targets Palestinians. Such an accusation is not only false, it demeans and detracts from the real horrors of apartheid, he asserted.

> A democratic state with equal rights

Recently returned from his visit, Cotler told The CJN that his views were received respectfully and with interest – without the emotion one might expect in a country that suffered under apartheid.

The view of Israel as practising apartheid does have currency in South Africa, Cotler conceded. "It is present there, but people in South Africa don't go around preoccupied with it."

South African political leaders are focused on domestic issues, such as women's rights and reforming the country's institutions. And during a question-and-answer session at Wits University, attended by some 500 students, in which he spoke on the pursuit of justice, it wasn't until he was halfway through the session before a student politely raised the question whether Israel was an apartheid state.

"Not at all," Cotler recalled answering. "In fact, to say that Israel is an apartheid state is a slanderous remark."

Unlike apartheid South Africa, Israel is a democratic state with equal rights, a free press, an independent judiciary, and a vibrant civil society with active NGOs.

From the editor's desk...

Last week in Doha, Qatari officials hosted a two-day gathering called the International Conference for the Defence of Jerusalem. Representatives from more than 70 countries and organizations reportedly attended. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas delivered one of the keynote addresses.

Among the egregiously false statements Abbas shared with his eagerly believing audience was the claim that "the Israeli occupation authorities are using the ugliest and most dangerous means to implement plans to erase and remove the Arab-Islamic and the Christian character of east Jerusalem.

As reported by Ha'aretz, Abbas compared Israel's control of Jerusalem to the Roman and Crusader occupations of the city. He also cast doubt on the existence of the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem and accused Israel of trying to harm the al-Aqsa Mosque, and he encouraged Arabs and Muslims to visit Jerusalem in order to strengthen their hold on the city and to "establish the Palestinian culture and heritage sites."

Truth does not sit comfortably on Abbas' tongue.

We have seen proof of his proclivity to dissemble time and time again. The most notable evidence, perhaps, was in an op-ed essay he wrote for the New York Times on May 16, 2011, in which he implied that Israel and not the Arabs had rejected the partition vote of November 1947. Renowned historian Shlomo Avineri described Abbas' essay as "shameful and mendacious."

The inability of the Palestinian leadership to accept Jewish sovereignty in Jerusalem is, understandably, part of the intractable political posturing over the future of the city. But the inability of the Palestinian leadership to accept any Jewish history in, or special connection to, Jerusalem is, lamentably and worrisomely, very problematic.

With Abbas' latest public prevarications still ringing in our ears, The CJN last week had the felicitous opportunity to ask a visiting Israeli historian and archeological authority to comment on the PA president's Doha accusations against the Jewish state.

He shook his head in disgust.

"We research our past there [in Jerusalem] and still we allow everyone else to look for their past as well," Shahar Shilo responded.

"The only reason others can visit their own holy sites is because they [the sites] are under the control of Israeli authorities. The only sites that are limited to the public are the ones held by the Waqf," Shilo emphasized. (The Waqf is the Muslim religious authority that controls the Temple Mount in Jerusalem.) "The Temple Mount is the most restricted area in Israel," Shilo added, pointing out that public, non-Muslim access to the Temple Mount is allowed only for certain hours and on certain days.

Shahar Shilo

Shilo is a member of the department of tourism and hotel management at Ben-Gurion University in the Negev. He is the manager of the very rigorous national educational program based in Jerusalem that accredits tour guides in Israel. He is also currently the marketing director for the heritage site of Ir David (the ancient City of David). Shilo has an MBA and a master's degree in history and is currently working on his PhD.

Shilo was in Toronto last week on a quick stop to speak, among other things, about the archeological, historical and heritage treasures that await a visitor to Israel in the Negev. He also told us of the recent archeological discoveries in the ancient City of David.

He spoke with great enthusiasm. He imparted information and knowledge to his audience like an electrical current sweeping a magnetic field. His listeners buzzed and hummed with question after question.

Cross-referencing sources from the Jewish and Christian bibles and from the writings of the historian Josephus, Shilo was especially rhapsodic about the new archeological findings in the ancient City of David, located just to the south of the walled Old City, underneath the Arab village of Silwan. He showed us slides of the spate of archeological discoveries there: ancient personal insignia seals, the ancient pool of Siloam, the Herodian road leading from the pool to the Temple Mount, the subterranean drainage channel adjacent to the path and personal items such as earrings, small statuaries and perhaps most exciting, a gold pomegranate-shaped bell worn by a Kohen to signal his presence in the Temple precinct.

In private conversation with The CJN after his formal presentation, Shiloh referred to Ir David as "the most important historical site in Israel, where the Jewish kingdom started."

He urged readers of The CJN to "come visit the country, the many sites to see where we started."

No amount of lying and prevarication by Abbas about Jerusalem's past can change what history, fact and science prove to be true.

Shahar Shilo attests to this important truth every day.

Negev Bookstore owners say goodbye after 51 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

As they served customers last week at Negev Bookstore, co-owner Arthur Kaplan and his wife, Mollie, talked about their plans to close the venerable Bathurst Street shop later this month.

Arthur Kaplan

Their family is probably looking forward to it.

They have four children, living in both Israel and New York, and "not enough" grandchildren, and they all want their parents and grandparents to spend more time with them, Mollie said.

"They're fighting over us," she laughed.

Arthur, 69, co-owns Negev with his brother, Mordechai, 66. They're closing the store and retiring. Arthur said they couldn't sell the business, but they sold the building that houses it.

Arthur has worked in the Bathurst Street business, which stocked books, Judaica and religious items, since 1961, when their father, David, opened the store.

A third brother, Israel (Izzy), who died two years ago, also worked at the store until he opened Israel's, the Judaica Store on Eglinton Avenue West, in 1982.

Without hesitation, Arthur credits the longevity of their business to God.

"We have to give Him credit for giving us a living, and for our children and grandchildren."

Mollie added that their customer service was also a huge factor. "We catered to everyone from Chassidim to non-Jews, and we went out of our way to make our customers happy."

She said that on one occasion, she and Arthur drove to Buffalo on the day of a customer's wedding to pick up pre-ordered benchers, which had not arrived to a Buffalo warehouse until that day.

"We were attending the wedding, so we put our clothes in the car, picked up the benchers, and then drove directly to the synagogue, where we changed into wedding [attire.]"

Cecile Kaplan, Mordechai's wife, said that her husband often delivered Jewish newspapers to his elderly customers if they couldn't get out of the house.

A lot of customers became like part of their family, Mollie said. "Generations of one family came into the store. They understood why we are closing, but they were upset when they heard the news.

"People came in to talk, to tell us their problems. We were also there to listen."

Arthur said the industry has changed since he and his father opened the store. "There are now iPads and e-readers, and people are buying books online. It's a different world now."

He feels "wonderful," though, about retiring, he said.

"When I get a call from my seven-year-old granddaughter asking me to come visit, my heart melts. Now we can go, and we can stay as long as we want."

Mollie said that the death of Izzy, who was the youngest brother, "really got us thinking about our priorities. You just never know what's going to come."

Associated opening new Cedarvale preschool

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Associated Hebrew Schools is planning to open a new location for preschoolers at Beth Sholom Synagogue next fall.

The Cedarvale Early Years Program will include the school's "Mini Mensch" (pre-nursery) program for children age 15 months to 3 years, and a nursery.

The Mini Mensch program, which currently operates only at the school's Kamin branch in Thornhill, is divided into two sections, one that children attend with a caregiver and one that they attend on their own.

Elana Shapiro Davidson

Almost 50 families attended an information session at the shul in January, where children took part in circle time led by a Mini Mensch teacher and were entertained by musician Mark Weinstock. Coincidentally, Associated operated an evening Hebrew school at Beth Sholom until about 40 years ago.

Rabbi Mark Smiley, Associated's director of education, told The CJN that the school, which has a total of 1,600 students at three branches, including a middle school, became aware in recent years that many alumni and supporters were living south of the school's southernmost branch on Neptune Drive – as far south as St. Clair Avenue.

"We started to see a critical mass [of parents] show interest about two to three years ago," he said. "At the same time, our Posluns branch [on Neptune] is close to being full.

"We are excited that Associated is continuing its tradition of putting its educational centres in areas that are accessible to its constituents – and who would have thought that families would be moving back into older Jewish neighbourhoods?"

Debbie Cohen Savage, a mother of two boys whose oldest son is in senior kindergarten at Posluns, lives near Bathurst Street and St. Clair. She says it's not uncommon for people to tell her that their grandparents lived on her street.

Because of the commute to Posluns, Cohen Savage said, "when we heard they were thinking about a preschool, we got very excited for our newborn."

The school is planning to provide a shuttle bus between the two locations for families who have children at both places. As well, an outdoor playground is being built.

Although there are other Jewish day schools in the area between Eglinton Avenue and St. Clair (Robbins Hebrew Academy, which is Conservative, and Leo Baeck Day School, which is Reform), the more traditional Associated is a closer match to Cohen Savage's and her husband's modern Orthodox values, she said.

Elana Shapiro Davidson, vice-principal of Bet Hayeled at Kamin, told The CJN there is excitement about the new program not only because Posluns has not had room to accommodate an early-years program, but because children entering nursery there are coming from a variety of programs.

"For kids to be with those friends and carry on together is something special. To have that continuity is really nice," she said.

Shapiro Davidson and Ora Shulman, current vice-principal at the Posluns branch, will be co-principals of Posluns next year, and Cedarvale will be part of their responsibilities.

Shapiro Davidson said that Mini Mensch represents children's "first entrance into school, and we really want them to feel they're in a Jewish setting... There's a big focus on language, [but in addition to academics] parents need to feel the place is safe and warm and loving and nurturing."

Yad Vashem seminar helped history teacher

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Warren Masters

A Toronto high school teacher is using information gleaned from a Yad Vashem studies program in Jerusalem to teach students about the Holocaust.

Warren Scott Masters, who teaches history and politics to grades 9 to 12 students at Crestwood Preparatory College and heads its social studies department, attended Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies in the summer of 2007.

Masters, 46, has used his expertise to develop two projects that heighten students' awareness and understanding of the Holocaust.

The Oral History Project and the Holocaust Symposium draw on the testimonies of local Holocaust survivors.

Masters, a two-time finalist for the Governor-General's Award for Excellence in Teaching Canadian History, also runs a program designed to turn students into socially conscious individuals. Many of the participants in the Youth Against Racial and Religious Discrimination program attend the Oral History Project and the Holocaust Symposium.

A McGill University graduate and a recent recipient of the Canadian Prime Minister's Award for Teaching Excellence, Masters attended the four-week Yad Vashem seminar along with 40 other educators from around the world.

He was nominated for the program by Max Eisen, a survivor and community activist whom he befriended.

"We learned about every aspect of the Holocaust, from its origins through to the liberation of the concentration camps," Masters said. "We also spent a great deal of time on the pedagogical aspects of the Holocaust, looking at the many different ways to teach this difficult subject."

He added, "The content and philosophy were always challenging and surprising, while the human stories were memorable and emotional. We had the benefit of meeting some of the best minds in the field of Holocaust studies."

Although Masters was broadly familiar with the events of the Holocaust and had previously invited survivors to speak in his classes, the Yad Vashem seminar added to his knowledge considerably.

"Yad Vashem helped me to better understand and see the significance of having survivors present in class," he said. "So I redoubled my efforts and worked on developing the Oral History Project when I returned from Jerusalem."

Holocaust symposium focuses on history

Using a small group approach, Masters puts four to eight students together with a survivor to facilitate conversations.

"The Yad Vashem seminar enables me to ensure that a survivor's testimony is appropriate for the students and helps me understand what questions are best to ask."

The Holocaust Symposium, which brings together six survivors and Grade 10 students, focuses on history but also on tolerance and diversity issues.

Judging by his observations, he feels students always appreciate the presence of a survivor in a classroom.

Masters said most students who take modern history courses are strongly interested in World War II and the Holocaust.

The Holocaust, he said, "is a topic many students want to understand better because it seems so incomprehensible in so many ways."

Since roughly half of Crestwood's student body is Jewish, many students have family connections to the Holocaust and a fair number have grandparents who are survivors.

In his Canadian history lessons, Masters never fails to mention that Canada admitted only about 5,000 European Jewish refugees from 1933 to 1945.

"We talk about that issue quite a bit. It's pretty shameful on all levels. It's a real eye opener for many students when we examine some of the diary entries of Canada's then-prime minister, Mackenzie King, or when we discuss the voyage of the St. Louis."

As well, Masters discusses the prevalence of prewar antisemitism in Canada.

"It's unfortunately not surprising, given the xenophobic nature of early 20th-century Canada. It is something we consider in the context of larger racist and anti-immigrant issues from this era."

Asked whether young Canadians are generally well informed about the Holocaust, he replied, "That really varies. Many students are really quite knowledgeable, but there are others who just aren't. In many of these cases, students have emigrated from countries where their previous education just didn't include the Holocaust. Still other students might not have a deep interest in history."

The Holocaust is a profound lesson in human behaviour, Masters said.

"It can teach us a lot about the terrible lows and the evil that people are capable of. It can also teach us about people's apathy. When combined, these factors allowed the Holocaust to happen.

"But the Holocaust teaches positive lessons, too. So we talk about the Righteous among the Nations. That's one of the reasons I invite survivors. There is always something remarkable in their recollections that creates a positive energy for the students."

For Masters, Holocaust denial is always jolting.

"Denying history of any kind really is troubling, but with the Holocaust, it is especially disturbing. I have gotten to know many survivors, many of whom lost everything and continue to carry guilt and pain all these years later. So you take it personally when you hear someone deny, minimize or distort the Holocaust out of hate or some sort of political agenda."

An ancient, yet modern, menace

There is no way to avoid referring to the extra drama underlining the celebration of Purim this year for every Jew around the world. Some 2,500 years after the events of the Purim story unfolded in Persia (modern-day Iran), the same swaggering hatred of Jews that obsessed the Iranian leaders of those days and the same aspiration toward genocide that such hatred spawned then appear to reaching a crescendo of menace today.

Public pronouncements against that menace – the development of nuclear weapons capability by Iran – were unambiguously and carefully articulated last week in Ottawa and Washington, merely days ahead of the merriment and noisemaking, the sending of gifts to our friends and aid to the needy that will typify our celebration of Purim this week.

During a visit by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper reaffirmed his opposition to Iran developing nuclear weapons and urged that every avenue for a peaceful resolution of the crisis be explored while recognizing "the right of Israel to defend itself as a sovereign Jewish state."

In Washington, D.C., on Sunday, ahead of a visit by Netanyahu, U.S. President Barack Obama said much the same thing to the annual policy conference of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. "Iran's leaders should have no doubt about the resolve of the United States, just as they should not doubt Israel's sovereign right to make its own decisions about what is required to meet its security needs. I have said that when it comes to preventing Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, I will take no options off the table, and I mean what I say."

The unambiguous language by Harper and Obama is significant, for Iran has often made clear that the first priority of its foreign policy is the removal of the Jewish state from the map of the world. Hence the constant, stomach-churning worry about Tehran's development of nuclear weapons.

The ever-heightening tension surrounding the crisis with Iran is the discomfiting, emotional and psychological backdrop to the celebration of Purim this year. And thus the extra drama.

And yet, as the cartoon on this page bids us, we will don a mask to make children laugh, to set aside our worries and to convey to them and to ourselves our confidence in the future despite those worries.

But once the masks are returned to their drawers or closets, we set ourselves to the task of ensuring our own rescue from the ancient, yet modern, menace. The Purim story tells us how.

We must act together. We must unite against the common danger. We must care for one another. We must do for one another. We must regard the safety and well-being of one as the safety and well-being of all. Happy Purim.

British MP Grenville Janner said he would use his parliamentary privileges to identify Nazi war criminals living in his country against whom he believed sufficient evidence existed to warrant extradition. He was referring to a Simon Wiesenthal Center report listing 17 war crimes suspects. U.K. law did not provide for war crimes prosecutions, so suspects could only be extradited in response to foreign requests.

The remarkable Rabbi Plaut

Thank you for the wonderful tributes to the remarkable Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut in recent editions of The CJN.

One of my most precious possessions is a very meaningful book written by Rabbi Plaut, The Price and Privilege of Growing Old. This book was given 10 years ago to those who, like myself, moved into the new seniors building in Toronto constructed by Baycrest Residential Properties, the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community. I will be forever thankful and treasure the unique occasion of meeting Rabbi Plaut for the first time and introducing him as the first guest speaker of our ongoing monthly meetings.

The Price and Privilege of Growing Old invites its readers to draw conclusions about their own futures and find answers for all of us who face the question, "Where am I now in life and what lies ahead for me?" For all senior citizens, or for those planning to become one, this book is a must-read!

Human rights museum a blessing

The Canadian Human Rights Museum now being built in Winnipeg is a blessing for all Manitoba citizens. Its structure is architecturally stunning and in my humble opinion could sit with pride anywhere in the world today. It radiates intelligence, physical magnificence, kindness and, most importantly, it is generating focus on the true meaning of human rights, and sending this message to the world.

A project of this magnitude will not escape criticism. Debating the issues surrounding this world wonder is healthy and necessary. The structure is spiritually uplifting, and it alone will draw many people with its solid educational, and enlightening, mandate.

The dream of the late Izzy Asper has, in part, become a reality as the result of the never-ending energy put forth by his daughter, Gail, who has travelled the world inspiring others to contribute. I thank all the private financial contributors worldwide as well as the federal government for having the foresight to see the museum's true potential.

Sometimes a cigar is just a cigar

Any way you slice it, the morning prayer's blessing for not having made me a woman is a sexist statement ("What men are saying," letters, Feb 16). Given other anti-women idioms by our sages, such as "Better to burn the words of the Torah than to teach them to a woman," "Women are too lazy and can't be trusted with some mitzvot," "Speaking to women will get you to hell," and the all-time low, "Man should not walk between two dogs, two pigs or two women," perhaps the letter writer – and other apologists – should consider that our sages were simply being honest about their "knowledge" and not so concerned about 21st-century political correctness. Sometimes a cigar is just a cigar, and chauvinists are just chauvinists.

Hana's Suitcase on Stage

I was interested to read the front-page story on Hana's Suitcase, by Paul Lungen, where he notes that in addition to Karen Levine's book, there was also a TV documentary by Joe Schlesinger on Hana's story, a film, a website, and a Japanese touring group of student actors called Small Wings who told Hana's story ("Poignant story touches the world: began 20 years ago with CJN interviews," Feb. 23).

I wanted to bring to your attention that Toronto author Emil Sher wrote a very moving play called Hana's Suitcase on Stage (published in February 2006), based on Karen Levine's original story. It has been performed all over North America. Hana's brother, George Brady, and his daughter, Lara, were present for the Montreal production, as was the playwright.

Shalachmones

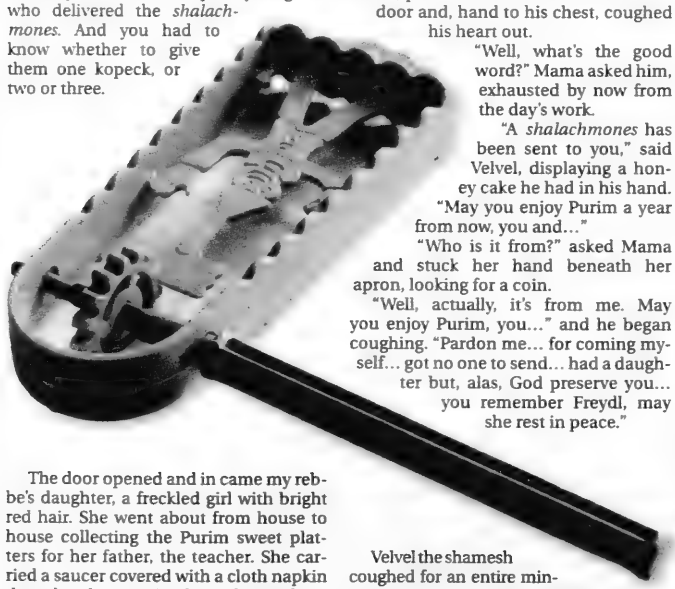
Sholom Aleichem

Translated from Yiddish and with an afterword by Curt Leviant

Wearing a silk kerchief and a plain apron – a combination of holiday and weekday attire – Mama stood by the table, practically at her wit's end. It was no trifle, you know, receiving almost a hundred shalachmones, the traditional Purim platter of sweets, and sending out a like number. Mama had to be careful not to omit anyone or make any mistakes, God forbid. She also had to remember what sort of platter to send to whom. For instance, if someone favoured you with a fruit-cut, two jam-filled pastries, a poppy-seed square, two tarts, a honey bun and two sugar cookies, it was customary to send in return two fruit-cuts, one jam-filled pastry, two poppy-seed squares, one tart, two honey buns, and three sugar cookies.

One had to have the brains of a prime minister not to create the sort of first-class muddle that once took place, alas, in our shtetl. What happened was that a woman named Rivke-Beyle mistakenly shipped back to one of the rich matrons the very same platter of Purim goodies that the rich matron had sent her. You should have seen the scandal this caused. The squabble that broke out between the husbands blossomed into a full-blown feud – smacks, denunciations and unending strife.

Besides worrying about what to send to whom, you also had to tip the youngsters who delivered the shalachmones. And you had to know whether to give them one kopeck, or two or three.



The door opened and in came my rebbe's daughter, a freckled girl with bright red hair. She went about from house to house collecting the Purim sweet platters for her father, the teacher. She carried a saucer covered with a cloth napkin that already contained one honey bun, dotted with a solitary raisin and next to it, a silver coin. Mama lifted the napkin and placed another coin alongside the first. She also slipped something into the girl's hand. The redhead blushed furiously and rattled off the traditional blessing: "May you enjoy Purim a year from now, you, your husband, and your children."

Following the teacher's daughter came a chubby lad with a swollen cheek bound with a blue kerchief and eyes of unequal size. In his hand he held a little brass tray on which lay a fruit-cut. This small cake was impressed with the shape of a tiny fish filled with honeyed dough crumbs. Next to it lay several silver coins and a few paper rubles. The chubby lad went right up to Mama and in one breath rattled off his greeting as though it had been memorized by rote: "Happy holiday. The rabbi sent you this shalachmones. May you enjoy Purim a year from now, you and your husband and your children."

The chubby lad palmed his tip and took off without a farewell, because by mistake he had dashed it off upon entering.

More people kept coming by. They brought various treats from the rabbinic judge, the cantor, the ritual slaughterers, the Torah scribe, the Talmud Torah teacher, the man who blew the shofar on Rosh Hashanah, the butcher who specialized in removing thigh veins, the reader of the Purim megillah, the Scroll of Esther, and the water carrier and the bathhouse attendant (the latter two also fancied themselves religious functionaries). After them came Velvel the shamesh himself, hoarse and ailing – he was asthmatic, poor man. He stood awhile at the door and, hand to his chest, coughed his heart out.

"Well, what's the good word?" Mama asked him, exhausted by now from the day's work.

"A shalachmones has been sent to you," said Velvel, displaying a honey cake he had in his hand. "May you enjoy Purim a year from now, you and..."

"Who is it from?" asked Mama and stuck her hand beneath her apron, looking for a coin.

"Well, actually, it's from me. May you enjoy Purim, you..." and he began coughing. "Pardon me... for coming myself... got no one to send... had a daughter but, alas, God preserve you... you remember Freydl, may she rest in peace."

Velvel the shamesh coughed for an entire minute and Mama quickly dug into her pocket and removed a few coins which she put into his hand. She also offered him some cake and a couple of fruit-cuts. Velvel stuffed the cake and the fruit-cuts into his breast pocket, thanked her and said: "May you enjoy Purim a year from now, you and your husband..." and once again began coughing.

I looked at Mama and noticed a tear standing in each of her beautiful eyes.

Velvel and his Purim treat cast a momentary gloom over the holiday mood. But it did not last long. Immediately after Velvel's departure other people arrived with more Purim sweet platters, and Mama kept on doling out the coins, here one, there two or three. Everyone received a piece of cake, a fruit-cut or a honey bun. For a poor man too should feel the joy of the holiday.

"May you enjoy Purim a year from now, you and your..."

"The same to you and many more to you and yours."

Afterword:

Sholom Aleichem (1859-1916), the great Yiddish humourist, always wrote stories pertaining to the holidays. The comedy and pathos of Purim in a shtetl are reflected in this touching little story. His narrative accurately reflects the tradition of sending platters or sweets to friends and relatives that is still practised today. An entire socio-political dynamic surrounded the sending of shalachmones. A woman always had to somehow balance the return platter so it should reflect the initial offering. Too little would be insulting. Too much would be self-aggrandizing. And one must never ever send back the same plate to the person who sent it.

The shalachmones were delivered by children who earned a few kopecks in tips for their service. In addition to cakes and pastries, coins were also sent to those people who needed extra income, like the narrator's teacher. The daughter of the teacher, or rebbe, is actually collecting and not giving shalachmones. She goes from house to house and gathers a few coins to supplement the meagre income of the rebbe, who taught little boys in his house.

The chubby boy is bringing sweets from the shtetl's rabbi – and that's why in addition to coins, there are also paper ruble notes on the plate, for the people's generosity was enhanced for the shtetl's leading religious figure. He too earned a meagre salary.

And Velvel, the shamesh, or sexton, who took take care of the synagogue, and went from door to door early on weekday mornings to wake the men up for services, also needs to supplement his small salary. Note that he apologizes for delivering the shalachmones himself. Usually, this was done by children. It was not dignified for an adult to go from house to house delivering the Purim sweet platters. But, as we learn, Velvel had lost his only child, a daughter, and so perforce he himself has to go from household to household to offer his Purim sweets and collect something for himself.

Delegitimization of Israel threatens peace hopes

Gil Troy

in Montreal

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas went to Doha, Qatar, and declared a Jerusalem jihad at the end of February. He was a tad more subtle than that, "moderate" that he is. All he did was accuse Israel of trying to replace the Al-Aqsa mosque with a Third Temple while "Judaizing" the city.

He, of course, would bear no responsibility if anyone turned violent based on those words at an international conference discussing the fate of the Holy City.

This is the modern Arab version of Jerusalem syndrome, that medical condition that makes some pilgrims to the Holy City just a little bit crazy. The need to turn demagogic when talking about the "city of peace," the need to exaggerate how bleak things are there, reflects a deeper pathology. The status quo should be the Palestinians' best friend. The more things are stable, the less violence there is, the better chance there is of a territorial compromise, as security concerns fade. But radical Palestinians, including, apparently the PA president, fear the status quo will freeze in the "occupation" forever. They believe that the only way to make progress is to fight, thereby playing into Israeli insecurities about Palestinian violence, of course.

For too long the threat of violence and the rejection of Israel's right to exist has terrorized the region. Since the Oslo accords of the early 1990s, the mainstream Israeli consensus has acknowledged the legitimate national rights of Palestinians, and accepted the notion of territorial compromise. But the optimism of the 1990s soured, as the terrorism of the early 2000s emerged, reflecting a conscious strategy on the part of former PA president Yasser Arafat and others.

When the Palestinians turned from the negotiating table to suicide bombings and sniping, many on the Israeli left and even more in the Israeli centre were terrorized and traumatized. They need reassurance now that new compromises will not lead to a new round of killing. They need to see a Palestinian commitment to building their own society that is greater than the long-held Palestinian desire to destroy all that their neighbours have built.

In this context, the Gaza Disengagement of 2005 hovers in the air like a bad smell. Israel withdrew, hoping for peace, and ended up with a rain of rockets. In the ultimate symbol of Palestinian dysfunction, well-meaning, mostly Jewish, philanthropists, raised $14 million to purchase the settlers' greenhouses. They then donated the greenhouses, only to see them thoroughly trashed within days of the transfer.

It is hard enough for both Palestinians and Israelis to manage their own emotions, their own extremists, their own narratives. The situation is worsened by a different version of Jerusalem syndrome, that is epidemic on too many campuses and in too many corners of the radical left. Too many radicals have declared their own Jerusalem jihad against Israel.

They sloganeer here and there, about Zionism being racism and Israel being an apartheid state. Filled with self-righteousness, drunk on their own rhetoric, reassured by their small circle of mutually reinforcing yes men and women, these laptop warriors have launched a full-scale war against the State of Israel, not realizing how much harm they do. The more they delegitimize Israel, the more difficult it becomes for Israelis to trust, to make peace.

The caustic attacks from abroad cannot damage the modern State of Israel as an economic powerhouse, a military power, a thriving society. But they can – and they do – threaten the fragile hopes for peace. Just as lawyers teach that you cannot suck and blow, in relationships between people and between country, you can not hug and go into a defensive crouch simultaneously. Israel cannot be expected to make the necessary, painful compromises for any kind of peace amid a relentless campaign questioning Israel's very right to exist.

This June will mark the 45th anniversary since the Six Day War. In many ways, the settlement strategy worked. In the Middle East, rather than negotiating about Israel's existence, most of the focus is on Israel's borders, specifically some of the West Bank bargaining chips won in 1967. How odd that many of those closest to the conflict are so far ahead of their supposed supporters further away. The war of delegitimization against Israel should end – not only for the sake of the Jews but also for the sake of the Palestinians.

Who will be the next Plaut?

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

Like most of the rest of the Jewish world, I was deeply saddened to read of the passing of Rabbi Gunther Plaut. It hit me personally.

Having been the assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto from 1983 to 1986 I had the privilege of occasionally working with him, although he was no longer the senior rabbi, but had the title senior scholar. In those days, I was the only female rabbi in the whole country, and I think it piqued Rabbi Plaut's imagination to see if I would be different from the male rabbis at Holy Blossom. I remember him asking in my first week if I needed help on my introductory sermon. I think he was shocked and equally delighted when I told him thanks anyway, but I wanted to succeed or fail on my own two feet for that first sermon.

After that, we felt totally comfortable with each other.

I looked up to him, because while he truly loved Jews, he wanted them to be better Jews, and he was willing to accept the consequences of unpopular and high standards. He pushed, he cajoled and he demanded. He didn't mind not pleasing all the people all the time. He cared more about being true to Jewish values. He truly relished being a rabbi, but he had little patience for foolish, territorial, or ignorant rabbis. He held his fellow Reform rabbis to a very high bar and was often the voice of the "loyal opposition" to Reform policies he doubted would advance the cause of the entire Jewish people.

I looked up to him because he had no tolerance for racism, sexism or homophobia. In 1998, upon the publication of my first book on feminist analysis of Torah, he told me that had he known "then" what he knew "now" about feminist approaches to text, he would have been much more sensitive and attuned when writing his famous Torah commentary. He admitted that his great commentary, which everyone accepted as authoritative, was lacking in that perspective. He was then 85 years old, and even though he came from a totally different era, he was completely prepared to learn something new from and about women in the rabbinate.

I looked up to him, because as I was deciding whether or not to go to rabbinical school in the late 1970s, I looked around me and was often disappointed with the rabbis I saw.

I saw learned rabbis who didn't touch people's hearts, and sincere charismatic rabbis who didn't know text. I saw rabbis marching for civil rights who didn't live Torah and "hippie" rabbis who only cared about their own souls. I started to follow Rabbi Plaut's writings and teachings, and I saw in him what I most believed a Reform rabbi could and should be.

So when the opportunity to serve at Holy Blossom came, I jumped at the chance to be close to a real rabbi's rabbi, a scholar who cared about the world outside his books and an activist who could quote Maimonides by heart.

Because I looked up to him, I now find myself asking: who will be the next Rabbi Plaut? Who in the Reform movement has the greatness, the learning and scholarship, the burning passion for justice, the respect of almost every other rabbi of not only our own denomination but the others as well? Who can move mountains and government officials and simple Jews? Who will be the rabbi's rabbi, the one we can all look up to and hope to emulate and follow, and learn from? There are great names, to be sure, but many if not most of them are also older and will be gone in my lifetime.

Who of a younger generation in the Reform movement has that greatness? I don't mean popularity, or the most "likes" on Facebook, or the cleverest blog. Someone whose sermons not only make it onto the Huffington Post but someone whose deep Torah teachings changes lives. Not fame or well-reviewed books or New York Times opinion articles, but profundity, authority and clarity. Someone who's unafraid of who's to their left or who's to their right.

Who would you consider a giant who can stand in the shadow that Rabbi Plaut cast?

The Jewish world is poorer by far, and I for one am blessed to have known someone I could truly look up to.

Assad emulates his father in Syria's uprising

Like his late father, Hafez, Bashar Assad relies on unrestrained brutal force to maintain his grip on power in Syria.

Thirty years ago, Hafez crushed a rebellion in Hama spearheaded by the Muslim Brotherhood. Shelling entire neighbourhoods indiscriminately, Syrian forces killed at least 10,000 residents in a scorched earth operation.

When the dust had cleared, Thomas Friedman, a New York Times foreign correspondent, was permitted to visit Hama. Surveying the bleak ruins, he wrote, "It was stunning. Whole swaths of buildings had been destroyed and then professionally steamrolled into parking lots the size of football fields."

Three decades on, Bashar is using coarse military means as well to squelch an insurrection. This revolt, stretching from Daraa in the south to Idlib in the north, erupted a year ago this month. Nationwide in scope, it has drawn in thousands of defectors from the army, the single most important institution in this ethnically fragmented country.

Last week, the focus of the uprising was on Homs, which has been bombarded every day for the past 30 days. "The scale of human tragedy in the city is immense," observed Marie Colvin, an American reporter who was killed by the shelling on Feb. 22. "The inhabitants are living in terror."

Navi Pillay, the United Nations high commissioner for human rights, has condemned the siege of Homs. Charging Assad's regime with having deployed tanks, rockets, artillery and mortars to pummel Homs, she accused the Syrian army of firing on densely populated neighbourhoods in "an indiscriminate attack on civilian areas."

On the day Colvin was cut down, a UN panel released a damning report concluding that Syria has committed crimes against humanity. Last week, Pillay said Syria should be referred to the International Criminal Court.

Assad, an ophthalmologist who succeeded his father following his sudden death in 2000, has been unrepentant and myopic, claiming the uprising is the work of "outsiders" and "terrorists" trying to destabilize Syria. Having pledged to use "an iron hand" to subdue his enemies, he has declared, "We will defeat the conspiracy without any doubt."

Assad's dogged determination to cling to power after the deaths of more than 7,000 Syrians is a function of the so-called Arab Spring, during which authoritarian rulers in Tunisia, Egypt, Libya and Yemen like himself have been swept away. A member of the minority Alawite sect, he rightly fears that he, his family and supporters will be subjected to bloody retribution by the majority Sunnis should he give in to popular demands for real sweeping change.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Inspired by the rebellions convulsing the Arab world, the long-suffering Syrian people awoke from their lethargy in March 2011, demanding democracy and an end to the culture of cronyism, corruption and autocracy. By doing so, Syrians challenged the legitimacy of the Assad family dynasty and of the secular Baath party, which has ruled, and oppressed, Syria for almost 50 years.

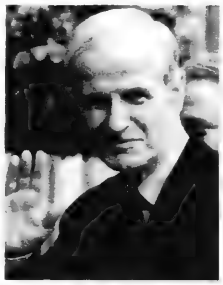
Assad launched his political career as a self-styled reformer, promising to open up Syrian society. But apart from bringing in economic reforms, which were largely of benefit to a tiny self-serving elite close to the regime, Assad's talk of democratizing Syria was merely rhetoric.

After the current uprising broke out, Assad passed a series of cosmetic decrees. He ended the 48-year state of emergency, issued an amnesty for political prisoners and gave Kurds citizenship. He also increased the salaries of civil servants, guaranteed university graduates jobs, raised food subsidies and cut the price of fuel.

On Feb. 26, in Assad's latest sop to the masses, he permitted Syrians to vote in a referendum for a new constitution. Under the new rules, multiple political parties could be established, the Baath party monopoly would end and the president would be limited to two seven-year terms.

The referendum, which was held as Syrian forces bombarded Homs and killed 50 additional civilians, was dismissed as a sham. The Syrian National Council, the umbrella organization of the opposition, declared that reforms were meaningless as long as Assad continued to resort to repression to quell the revolt. U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, noting that Assad would be able to serve for 14 more years, described the referendum as "phony."

Bashar Assad



Hafez Assad

Assad's crude repressive methods have pushed Syria to the brink of civil war and transformed a non-violent uprising into an increasingly violent and sectarian one. Liberal Syrians who had hoped that the regime was capable of reforming itself, if only for the sake of survival, have been bitterly disillusioned.

"Some of us [believed] that… President Assad might, under the right circumstances, deliver on his promise to reform the system from within," Hind Aboud Kabawat, an opposition figure living in Canada, has written.

These misplaced and dashed hopes have spawned a revolt that has become the bloodiest episode of the Arab Spring.

The Free Syrian Army, the armed wing of the rebellion, has taken a lead role in waging war on Assad's regime. Having recruited as many as 40,000 army defectors, it attacks military convoys and sites and assassinates high-ranking government officials and army officers. Of late, Sunni extremists linked to Al Qaeda's branch in Iraq have joined the fray, having reportedly been responsible for two recent bombings in Damascus and one bombing in Aleppo, cities that have generally stood aloof from the fighting.

Assad combats them from a position of considerable strength: the Sunni merchant class and Syria's security forces remain loyal and the Syrian opposition is divided along ethnic and ideological lines.

Assad can also count on a few allies.

Iran, Syria's longtime strategic partner, has provided financial and logistical support and a steady flow of weapons. Hezbollah, a Syrian client, has rallied behind him. Russia and China have vetoed two UN Security Council resolutions critical of Syria and continue to ship arms to Damascus.

Yet Assad faces pressure from all sides. The UN General Assembly has urged him to step down. The Arab League, the United States, Canada and the European Union have imposed sanctions. Arab countries from Egypt to Saudi Arabia have recalled their respective ambassadors. Turkey, once an ally and key trading partner, has turned against him. Hamas, critical of the harsh crackdown, has broken ranks with Assad.

Israel has shed no tears over Assad's predicament and waits for a new order in Damascus to downgrade Iran's status in Syria. Yet Israel fears that his demise may heighten tensions on its northern border, which has been relatively quiet since the 1974 disengagement agreement with Syria.

Major powers such as the United States and Britain have renounced an intention to intervene militarily in Syria, as they did in Libya last year. But with the revolt growing exponentially, they may yet send weapons and munitions to Syrian rebels.

On Purim, read, eat and make noise.

Purim is a time to recall the courage of Esther and Mordechai. To read the Megilla, to celebrate by feasting and drinking and, of course, to make lots of noise when we hear the name Haman the villain. Finally, there is misloach manot or tzedakah – the sharing of food or money with those who are poor.

The partners managing the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund wish you and your family a very Happy Purim. Let us celebrate, but most of all, let us be grateful for our good fortune.

Renowned singers perform at Sephardi music fest

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

The Sephardic Music Festival brought renowned singers from Israel, Montreal and Toronto to the Sephardic Kehila Centre last week.

A packed audience of more than 250 people enjoyed the diverse performances of Jewish singers from around the world at the Feb. 28 event.

"It was a great success," said Max Benaim, president of the Sephardic Kehila Centre, who organized the Toronto event. "The music brought back a lot of memories for the audience members."

Many of the Moroccan songs were ones that members of the community recalled hearing in their homes when they were growing up. "You could see the audience singing along," said Benaim.

Since he was 16, Benaim has been volunteering in the community, and now at the age of 60, he still plans community events. He recently brought Enrico Macias, the Algerian Jewish singer, to Toronto.

The audience was made up of both Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews, with everything from haredi to less traditional Jews. "It was nice to see a diverse crowd, especially many young people," said Benaim.

David Wizman, a soloist from Israel, performed songs in Hebrew, Arabic and Spanish. Originally from Casablanca, Morocco, he has been studying Sephardi music since he was a child. After moving to France, he now lives in Israel, where he studies, teaches and performs across the country. He is knowledgeable in Bakashot and Andalusian music, rare in this generation. He started off by singing slow tunes and then quickened the pace with lots of drumbeats from the orchestra, which got the crowd clapping and whistling.

It was clear, by the thunderous applause, that the audience loved the performance by Lior Elmaliach, a soloist from Kiryat Shmonah, Israel. "Honestly, I was shocked to hear the power in his voice," said Benaim. "All the singers were fantastic, but Lior's vocal range is unbelievable."

Elmaliach grew up in Israel where he began learning liturgical poems. By age 13, he was already performing across the country, and now he travels to Russia, France, the United States and around the world to perform. He is known for his strong, ringing tenor voice.

During each song, Elmaliach lengthened the notes to demonstrate his wide vocal range, which received lots of encouragement and applause from the audience, who quickly began to clap along. The event also featured Cantor Rabbi David Kadoch, from Toronto, who at the age of 24 already has a large repertoire of Arabic, Hebrew and Spanish music.

The singers were accompanied by the Moroccan Andalusian Orchestra of Montreal, made up of four Jewish musicians and one Arab musician, specializing in Andalusian music from the Middle Ages. "At one point, the orchestra's violinist began playing the traditional Sephardic 'lelele' sound and everyone turned around to see if it was someone from the audience, but it was really coming from the violin," said Benaim.

The event was a prelude to the Sephardi cultural week that will take place in June, highlighting Sephardi music, culture, food and ancient artifacts. Synagogues across the city are participating in this event.

BBYO teens gather for convention in Atlanta

Compiled by CJN Staff

Atlanta hosted more than 1,100 visitors from multiple countries Feb. 16 to 20 for the largest-ever international convention of BBYO, one of the world's major Jewish youth groups.

Teen delegations represented Jewish communities in Argentina, Bulgaria, Canada, Curacao, Germany, Ireland, Israel, Latvia, Macedonia, Serbia, South Africa, Turkey, Ukraine, the United Kingdom and the United States.

For 80 years, this convention has brought together leaders of BBYO's AZA and BBG, to plan for the coming year, determine strategies for strengthening BBYO as a youth-led movement and connect teens to the worldwide Jewish community.

At the convention, Benji Fages, 16, a Grade 11 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, was elected to BBYO's 2012-2013 international board. As grand aleph shaliach (vice-president for Jewish heritage), Fages will serve as a resource, adviser and sounding board for his counterparts across the system, while focusing on enhancing the Judaic content in programs in every community.

"I want to stress the importance of having a united global Jewish community," Fages said. "The strength of the Jewish teen community is vast, and by focusing on what beliefs and interests we share, we can take strides towards becoming more socially responsible while building our Jewish identity and love of Israel. BBYO has helped nurture within me a responsibility to assist in creating a united, socially responsible and Judaically connected future."

Sixteen Toronto-area delegates were among 900 teens from 13 countries attending the 86th international convention of BBYO in Atlanta, Ga., last month.

In addition to the nearly 900 teens in attendance, 16 of them from the Toronto area, the convention also brought together BBYO professionals, members of the board of directors and volunteer advisers.

With the convention theme Our Tomorrow Starts Today, participants focused on what they can do, as representatives of a movement of more than 31,000 teens, to make an immediate difference in the world.

The weekend was headlined by a Day of Service and Advocacy, during which the teens dispersed throughout Atlanta to 18 service-learning sites. One track included the first all-teen audience premiere and a question-and-answer session with Lee Hirsch, director of The Bully Project, a new feature-length documentary that follows "a year in the life" of America's bullying crisis.

Another track, focusing on pro-Israel advocacy, was held at Emory University Hillel in partnership with leadership development staff from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), with guest speakers including the Vanguard Group, an African-American young professionals and graduate student pro-Israel advocacy network from Atlanta, as well as members of AIPAC's board of directors and congressional staff.

Other service sites included media and advocacy training at CNN and Fox News; an urban expansion study, discussion and cleanup hike with the Atlanta Beltline Project; and the creation of a new panel for the AIDS Memorial Quilt Names Project.

Anti-Israel bias in media receding: journalist

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Anti-Israel bias in the media has dimmed in recent years, says a leading Canadian journalist.

"It is not as big a problem as it used to be," said Jonathan Kay, a managing editor of the Toronto-based National Post.

Kay made this comment at a panel discussion on media perceptions of the Middle East. Sponsored by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies, the event was held at the University of Toronto last week.

Three other journalists took part: Michael Coren, host of Sun TV's The Arena; Carole MacNeil, a CBC TV broadcaster, and Tarek Fatah, host of a CFRB radio show and author of The Jew is Not my Enemy.

The moderator, Avi Benlolo, is president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies.

Kay listed four reasons why media bias against Israel has receded:

• The popularity of the Internet makes it infinitely more difficult for the press to get away with anti-Israel slanders.

• Vastly exaggerated reports concerning the Palestinian death toll in Israel's raid on a Palestinian refugee camp in Jenin in 2002 shamed many reporters who had accepted the figures and prompted them to question future Palestinian claims.

• A spate of suicide bombings in the first years of the second intifadah stained the Palestinian cause.

• Reporters and editors consider the Arab Spring – the popular rebellions that have broken out in the Arab world since 2011 – more interesting and compelling than the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Addressing a related topic, Kay said this year's Israeli Apartheid Week on North American university campuses will be the "lamest" ever, because the media is focused on current political upheavals in Arab countries.

Denouncing Israeli Apartheid Week as profoundly anti-intellectual, Coren said South African-style apartheid simply does not exist in Israel.

Tarek Fatah

"The notion that Israel is an apartheid state is laughable," he declared, adding the accusation is "simplistic and dumb."

But in the interest of preserving the sanctity of free speech, Israeli Apartheid Week should not be banned, he argued.

"Not everyone who hates Israel hates Jews, though there are crossovers," he said.

In a survey of Israel's past and present image, Coren said that while Israel was once widely admired in the West, it lost its lustre in the wake of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Today, pro-Israel sentiments have been largely overtaken by growing interest in and sympathy for "the Palestinian narrative." It is "fashionable" in media circles to be pro-Palestinian, he said.

But he wondered why left-wing activists who usually castigate Israel have not condemned Syria for killing thousands of its own citizens in its ferocious military response to the current nationwide rebellion.

MacNeil said that while some reporters are reluctant to cover the Middle East because they fear "blowback," she has not been intimidated or deterred by it.

In a passing observation on CBC's coverage of the region, MacNeil claimed there is no "systematic" anti-Israel bias at the CBC.

Israel, though, "punches way above its weight" in terms of the stories it generates.

In a blistering critique of the manner in which the media has covered the Arab Spring, Fatah said, "I'm appalled by the level of ignorance."

He claimed reporters on the scene don't really want to understand the complexities of the Arab uprisings.

As an ongoing story, Fatah said, Iran's quest for a nuclear arsenal has supplanted Israel's struggle with the Palestinians.

Fatah expressed puzzlement as to why Israel is singled out for condemnation by Israeli Apartheid Week while Arab countries that practise this form of institutional segregation on a regular basis are given a free pass.

But he said Israel's occupation of Arab territory captured in the Six Day War is a legitimate topic for debate.

Toward the close of the discussion, Fatah stormed out in a huff, hotly suggesting that Kay's comment on Arab "fixers" – local people who assist foreign journalists for a fee – was implicitly racist.

Fatah's abrupt walkout occurred shortly after Kay disclosed he had paid an Arab woman in Ramallah, who also owns a gift shop there, for her services in guiding him around and arranging interviews in that West Bank town.

In Kay's defence, MacNeil said "fixer" is a universally accepted term used by journalists who report from abroad.

Bitter truths about Hamas

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last month, David Horovitz, former editor of the Jerusalem Post and the Jerusalem Report, launched an online newspaper called the Times of Israel.

Horovitz, the author of Still Life with Bombers and A Little Too Close to God, is highly respected for his deeply informed analyses, mixed with a temperate but never dull approach to journalism.

In an intensely competitive media age that too often panders to heated polemics and sensationalism at the expense of accuracy and fairness, Horovitz remains dedicated to the latter two quaint, but core, values.

In an essay posted on the Times website, Horovitz explains his vision for the project: "Fair-minded journalism, based in Israel, and read both here in Israel and among those who care for the Jewish nation around the world, has a vital, even noble role to play in enabling informed debate over the challenges and the choices that face the Jewish state. Informing that debate is one of the prime goals of the Times of Israel.

"In support of this goal, our reporters, including many of the most respected names in the field, will be writing rich and enthralling original content."

On the commentary side, Horovitz emphasizes diversity: "Access to a diverse range of argument is critical to the understanding of Israel's challenges and choices."

David Horovitz

Horovitz can already boast of having aboard one of the most prominent journalists in Israel: Ehud Ya'ari. Fluent in Arabic, Ya'ari is also the political commentator for Israel's Channel 2 news.

In his Feb. 27 Times piece ("The agony of Hamas"), Ya'ari delved into the internal disputes within the Islamic movement, fractures largely glossed over by many western journalists who cover it.

Hamas, Ya'ari noted, is "severely divided" – and not just between the exiled or "external" leadership, headed by Khaled Meshal, formerly based in Damascus, and the "internal," Gaza-based leadership under Ismail Haniyeh. Ya'ari reveals how Hamas is also divided within the ranks of both major factions.

Qatar, which recently brokered a "unity" government deal between Hamas under Meshal and Fatah under Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, is the only Arab country willing to host Hamas' political headquarters. "Egypt, Jordan and even Sudan said no to Meshal's request," Ya'ari wrote. The Gaza leadership rebelled against the deal, which in any event appears to be foundering.

In the meantime, Haniyeh who not all that long ago was widely considered to be more "moderate" than Meshal, has engaged in an apparent role-reversal. About two weeks ago, he spent three days in Iran meeting with top leaders there. Haniyeh made a point of repeating Iran's description of Israel as a "cancer" that needs to be destroyed. (Playing to all parties, when Haniyeh subsequently visited Cairo, he spoke in support of the people of Syria, who are being butchered by President Bashar Assad – with the help of Iran.)

The sanguine view of Meshal as moderate was expressed by Michael Broning in an article ("Hamas Comes in From the Cold") posted Feb. 22 on Project Syndicate, an online hub of leading thinkers: "He may re-emerge as the head of a newly established Palestinian branch of the Muslim Brotherhood, or as a leader of a new Islamist political party under the umbrella of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Such a merging of Hamas with the established Palestinian political organizations would signify Hamas' formal acceptance of a two-state solution, and would mark an important step in transforming the movement."

Ya'ari, on the other hand, observed that while Meshal is talking about "popular" versus "armed resistance" to Israel and even about the acceptance of a Palestinian state within 1967 boundaries, he has nonetheless "stressed that there would be no peace or recognition of the Zionist Entity and the goal will remain the destruction of Israel."

This latter point is essential, but it's typically omitted by journalists and analysts who naively assume that Meshal is prepared to "recognize" Israel. On this, there's no daylight between Haniyeh and Meshal, or any other leader within Hamas. It's time to confront this bitter reality.

Paul Michaels is director of research and media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Jewish groups endorse moderate candidates

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The incoming student union executives at Carleton University and the University of Ottawa aren't the only ones celebrating their recent victories.

Hillel Ottawa, which openly endorsed candidates at the two schools who didn't have an anti-Israel agenda, is also looking forward to working with the new executives, who are both committed to dialogue and inclusivity.

Hillel Ottawa president Alexandra Izso said members of Hillel and the student-run Israel Awareness Committee (IAC) worked tirelessly last month to endorse "A Better Carleton" slate in the Carleton Student University Association (CUSA) elections, as well as two U of O students who ran for executive positions in the Student Federation at the University of Ottawa (SFUO).

"We helped with postering, we helped with getting people out to vote, sharing election information on Facebook, openly endorsing them by sending letters out to our membership list to get them to vote for the slate we were endorsing," said Izso, a political economy student at Carleton.

"The slate we elected isn't so much openly pro-Israel, which I appreciate, because what I didn't like about the other slate ['Fresh Carleton'] is that they openly chose a side, and I couldn't ask the same of the side I supported, because that would be hypocritical."

Last year, Carleton was embroiled in controversy when CUSA was scheduled to consider an anti-Israel motion put forward by the group Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) during a student council meeting.

In response, the IAC influenced a CUSA executive member to present a similar but more neutral motion that didn't single out Israel. When the neutral motion passed, cancelling out the motion that singled out Israel, the SAIA members who tabled the original motion became aggressive and confrontational.

Last month, when Izso learned that the "Fresh Carleton" slate – which was ultimately swept by "A Better Carleton" – included four members of SAIA, she was concerned that if they were elected, they'd use their positions to further their anti-Israel agendas.

Alexandra Izso

For example, Rabita Sharfuddin, who ran for vice-president of student issues for the Fresh Carleton slate, posted a campaign video in which she boasted about her role with SAIA and her plans "to fight for socially responsible investment policies" and to correct the fact that Carleton has "invested in war, military occupation and other violations of human rights."

Thanks in part to Hillel's campaigning efforts, more than 4,300 Carleton students – 500 more than last year – turned out to vote in this year's Feb. 15-16 election.

At U of O, about 15 per cent of the 34,000 undergraduates cast a ballot in the SFUO elections, held Feb. 14 to 16.

Iszo said she's encouraged that although the student union executives at both schools are not necessarily pro-Israel, they're not anti-Israel, either.

"We felt it's important to have a student union that is representative of all students, and if we have a student union that is openly taking sides and has marginalized some of their membership, then they are not accountable to all students who are paying members of this union," she said.

SFUO's incoming president Ethan Plato and vice-president, social, Jozef Spiteri were the two candidates endorsed by Hillel.

"They are pro-dialogue and are about bringing the campus together," Iszo said.

Incoming CUSA president Alexander Golovko, who won by just 79 votes, told Carleton's campus paper, the Charlatan, that he'll focus on "student issues, student unity… and the spirit of democracy.

"My personal diplomatic background, where I try to resolve conflict and unite people and try to understand everybody's approach… has always been to a certain extent criticized because I tend not to always take sides. I try to understand everybody. I try to get everybody together," he said.

Emile Scheffel, a former Carleton student and vice-president, external, for the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students, said he's confident Golovko will work to ensure Carleton students feel safe, valued, and included on campus.

Scheffel said he experienced a campus climate that was toxic, hostile and divided when he ran for CUSA's vice-presidency in 2010.

"I was targeted with a whisper campaign that I was Jewish and had radical pro-Israel views," said Scheffel, who is not Jewish, but served as a member of the IAC.

Nick Bergamini, also a non-Jewish, pro-Israel student, was a 2010 presidential candidate who was also targeted with posters accusing him of being an untrustworthy Zionist, he added.

"A Better Carleton slate represents a major victory for students who believe in an open, tolerant campus that rejects the toxic politics of the past."

IAW is becoming more and more marginal

Guest Voice

Howard English

This week, "Israeli Apartheid Week" (IAW) takes place on campuses in Canada and elsewhere. As happens every year, a small group of marginal activists hold events designed to slander Israel as a racist and fundamentally illegitimate state.

For students and faculty who support Israel – including both Jews and non-Jews – the vile distortions of IAW are offensive, frustrating and even angering. At a time when regimes across the Middle East persecute minorities and even slaughter civilian protestors, IAW singles out and attacks the sole democracy in the region. Perhaps worse, IAW advocates a rejectionist, aggressive approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

While Israeli leaders propose peace agreements, IAW activists call for a boycott of Israeli academics, athletes, and small businesses. While Israeli leaders call for coexistence and negotiations with Palestinian moderates, IAW activists embolden Palestinian extremists by redefining terrorism as "resistance." And while Israel's supporters push for a two-state solution to secure a future for both sides, many IAW activists call for a one-state "solution" – knowing full well this would mean the end of Israel. For IAW, it's not about peace. It's about the Jewish state's very existence.

In fact, the longtime academic mentor of IAW, extremist professor Norman Finkelstein, made this very point in a revealing interview at Imperial College London on Feb. 9. Clearly exasperated with the Boycott Israel campaign, Finkelstein blasted it as a "cult" that has achieved fewer victories than he can count on his 10 fingers. He charged that the movement "will never reach a broad public until and unless they're explicit on their goal. And their goal has to include recognition of Israel, or it's a non-starter. It won't reach the public. Because the moment you go out there, Israel will start to say: 'What about us? They won't recognize our rights.' And that is correct... There's a large segment of the movement that wants to eliminate Israel."

Finkelstein's analysis lies at the heart of why the IAW crowd has failed to resonate with a broad campus constituency. In refusing to endorse the two-state solution, the movement's rhetoric and goals are patently self-defeating. And its failure can be measured not in its fiery words, but in its lack of results.

University administrations have overwhelmingly condemned the boycott campaign and are strengthening ties with Israeli institutions. IAW events typically garner no more than a handful of already committed anti-Israel activists. And mainstream newspapers outside of our community give IAW very little coverage – and even that has declined dramatically. A recent study by the government of Israel found that coverage of IAW dropped last year by 40 per cent over the previous two years, noting that "in general media terms, IAW is a non-event."

Despite the well-founded anxiety IAW causes our community, Finkelstein's frustrations are very instructive. The boycott campaign, along with IAW, while perhaps providing a satisfying emotional outlet for anti-Israel activists, has miserably failed to resonate with average students and faculty.

Our community faces serious challenges on campus, not the least of which is the influence of those postmodern professors who promote a distorted perspective on the Middle East. The cumulative impact of such anti-Israel views, presented as respectable scholarship, is far more worrisome than the shrill and sparsely attended events of IAW. This issue, along with a number of other key long-term concerns, cannot be taken for granted.

Under the chairmanship of David Koschitzky, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs is working with local partners across the country to provide students with practical tools, expertise, and one-on-one issue consultation. We are supporting local Hillels, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students, and other pro-Israel groups on campus to counter this challenge in a co-ordinated, sustained, and strategic manner. Empowering students is at the core of this approach, for it is students who are at the forefront of the battle of ideas.

There's no question that IAW makes for one nauseating week of slogans, slander and sloppy history. But we must not take our eye off the real ball – the deep-seated challenges students are facing, that require our community to be at the top of our game 52 weeks a year.

Howard English is Senior Vice President, Greater Toronto Area and University Affairs, at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

U of W program lessens IAW conflict

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — While Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) has been an annual source of campus acrimony in the past, a program put on by the University of Winnipeg shows it doesn't have to be that way.

For the second year in a row, the administration at Winnipeg's second-largest university has sought to defuse IAW with a program of its own held at the same time, but focused on the Middle East and the Arab world in general, rather than solely on Israel.

"Israeli Apartheid Week is organized by student groups independent of the university administration," said Jeremy Read, senior executive officer and adviser to university president Lloyd Axworthy.

"Student groups have certain access rights. But we feel that it is important to provide some context and a greater understanding of the complexities of the Middle East as a whole."

Thus, last year, the university organized a series of lectures on the Middle East, highlighted by a presentation by Arab-Jewish Dialogue, a group of Jewish leaders, businessmen and professionals originally from the Arab world.

Read said last year's event was very well received.

"This year, we broadened our program," he said. "We have a number of faculty members with expertise in areas related to the Middle East. Our president, Dr. Lloyd Axworthy [Canada's Liberal foreign minister in the mid-1990s] also is knowledgeable about the region."

The U of W program consisted of two weeks of lectures and dialogue, from Feb. 28 to March 9, on a range of issues with the aim of shedding light on the past and understanding the present "Arab Spring," as well as conflicts occurring across the region.

The first week featured lectures on the current situation in Syria and Egypt, in addition to an overview of "the Responsibility to Protect" and the doctrine's relevance to the Arab Spring, presented by Axworthy, and a tripartite dialogue with Jewish, Christian and Muslim representatives on the panel.

The highlight of the second week was a lecture by Yoram Peri, speaking on "Israel, Iran and the Arab Spring: a Coming Storm?" Peri is a former senior political adviser to the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and a former editor-in-chief of the Israeli daily newspaper Davar. He's currently director of the University of Maryland's Joseph and Alma Gildenhorn Institute for Israel Studies .

The second week also featured sessions on Iranian persecution of the Baha'i and a historical look at the Middle East in the early 20th century.

"We at this university are not interested in mere slogans and provoking partisan conflict," Read said. "Rather, we want to get at what's really going on in the region. There are complex issues. What are the points of contention? How can we help encourage peaceful relations between peoples in the region? This is what a university should be doing."

Read said that since U of W introduced its program last year, other universities have contacted it for more information, with an eye to introducing a similar series on their own campuses.

South Africa backed anti-Iran resolution at UN

None of that was characteristic of apartheid South Africa. The slander, he continued, affects that anti-apartheid struggle and "is a form of apartheid denial."

Cotler made the case for Israel in meetings with senior cabinet ministers, when he urged them to reconsider their votes at UN forums where Israel is the subject of a delegitimization campaign. Supporters of equal treatment should be appalled at the singling out of Israel for differential treatment for its alleged human rights record, when gross human rights violators rights get "exculpatory" treatment, he said.

Cotler made the case for Israel in meetings with the ministers of justice and foreign affairs. He also urged them, as well as the parliament's justice and social affairs committee, to be in the forefront in confronting Iranian officials on the country's call to genocide. South African officials, he said, should not receive Iranian leaders when that country violates its citizens' human rights and advocates genocide of Jews.

Whether his arguments will be persuasive remains to be seen, he said, but he recalled another context in which a one-on-one visit made a difference.

In 1981, when he was Canadian legal counsel for then-imprisoned Nelson Mandela and Natan Sharansky, he was arrested during a visit to South Africa and taken to meet the country's then-foreign minister, Pik Botha.

When he entered the minister's office, he noticed a photo of Sharansky displayed prominently on the wall. Sharansky was a hero of the minister, it turned out. Botha saw him as a courageous opponent of Communism, and he wondered why Cotler was defending Mandela, whom Botha considered a Communist.

Cotler responded by saying both were fighting for freedom, and South Africa was the only post-Nazi country to institute a racist legal regime. Botha told Cotler he would come to see that South Africa was a democratic country, but when he visited the minister prior to departing, Cotler reminded Botha those rights did not apply to non-whites.

Later, Botha got into hot water in his own party when he said he could foresee the day the country would have a black government leader. He also became an advocate for Mandela's release.

Two-and-a-half years ago, Cotler recounted, he met with President Jacob Zuma and discussed the country's votes at the United Nations, in which South Africa opposed Canadian resolutions condemning Iran. At the most recent vote, South Africa supported the Canadian anti-Iran resolution, Cotler said.

"These discussions can have an impact, they can have a political dimension," he suggested.

During his visit, he was lobbied by senior government officials on Canada's visa policies that prevent travel here by current and former members of the African National Congress (ANC).

On his return to Canada, Cotler called on the Canadian government to revise its visa policy that prevents members of the ANC from visiting Canada.

"It is unacceptable for Canada to treat the heroes of the anti-apartheid movement – a historical struggle for a democratic, egalitarian and non-racial South Africa – as presumed terrorists," he stated.

While in South Africa, Cotler also participated in a reunion of defence counsels for Mandela. As well, he raised the issues of Iran, Syria, Congo and Sudan with South African leaders, and he delivered a lecture on Raoul Wallenberg on the centenary of Wallenberg's birth at an event sponsored by five governments.

He also met with representatives of the country's Jewish community. Although the number of Jews has dropped from 120,000 31 years ago to 70,000 today, emigration has stabilized, he said.

The community "is blessed with outstanding young leadership" and it is openly Zionist and Jewish, he said.

Chutzpadik anger with God

Rabbi Irit Printz

A man went to a tailor and commissioned a suit to be made. A month went by, then two, but the suit wasn't ready. Finally, seven months after the original order, the suit was ready. The customer had to admit that it was perfectly made, but he couldn't resist a little dig at the tailor. "God made the entire world in seven days, and it took you seven months to make one suit?" he asked. "Ah," the tailor replied, "but look at the state of the world, and look at the perfection of the suit!"

Judaism has a long and venerable tradition of poking fun at God, especially around Purim. Our sages termed this kind of joking "Chutzpah l'shem Shamayim" – irreverence for the sake of Heaven.

Perhaps the most famous example of this tradition appears in the Mechilta D'Rabbi Ishmael: "[You ask] who is like You among the gods, God?' Rather, say 'Who is like You among the mutes [ilmim] of the world – that you can witness the tragedy of Your children yet remain silent!" These words were written in the aftermath of the Romans' destruction of the Temple and Israel, when it became clear the exile would last far longer than the Babylonian exile did. It's not so much a play on words as a bitter cry full of anguish.

Engaging in these acts of irreverence gives us a way to filter our disappointment with God and this world through the safer, and often gentler, prism of satire. We want to know how it's possible that the world God created is so imperfect, so full of injustice, so full of senseless tragedy. It's a way of laying the fault for national and personal tragedies at God's feet without leaving God behind.

Rabbinic Reflections

That people are outraged by flagrant injustices is an amazing thing, when you think about it. What rational reason is there to expect things to turn out fine, to assume justice will prevail, to believe innocents will be protected? It would be far more rational to anticipate a world in which might equals right, in which no one protects those who are in need of protection, in which innocents lose their innocence or perish.

It's only in a world where we're created in God's image that we can dare imagine another way. We can create perfect suits. We can create other perfect goods. We can work toward a perfectly just society. We can try to protect the weak and ensure evil is kept at bay. But we expect, and demand, God's participation. And we're bitterly disappointed when it seems that God does, indeed, remain silent in the face of unspeakable suffering.

Ultimately, though, as long as people are angry with God over the imperfect state of the world, they'll continue to work to improve it. They'll continue to strive toward a world in which one cannot tell the difference between Mordechai and Haman, because there will be no difference between them. I reflect on that and am comforted.

The Exodus and earliest Israel

The Exodus is a pivotal point in our history as a people. Not only does it mark our deliverance from slavery but it also witnesses our coming together as a nation.

The theophany at Sinai sees us receiving our laws. It is these laws and their observance that lie at the heart of Judaism.

As a story, the Exodus has captivated and enthralled for more than 3,000 years. Even Hollywood has portrayed the event a number of times. For those of us of a certain age, Moses will always be Charlton Heston and his chief adversary, the Egyptian pharaoh, Ramses II, will forever look like Yul Brynner.

Ever since the latter part of the 19th century, which saw the emergence of archeology as a discipline, some scholars have been debating the veracity of the Exodus while others have been searching for proof of its existence.

One of the keys to unlocking this mystery is finding evidence of the existence of an entity called Israel outside of the Bible. Ideally it should occur in Egypt. If this can be done, then it makes the plausibility of the Exodus more convincing.

This is exactly what happened in Egypt in 1896 when the noted English Egyptologist William Matthew Flinders Petrie found a stele (royal inscription) belonging to the pharaoh Merneptah, the son of Ramses II. Amazingly, in addition to mentioning the places Ashkelon and Yokneam, the stele also mentioned a people called Israel, thus giving us the earliest verifiable evidence of Israel outside of the Bible. It stated that Israel was destroyed, a propaganda claim that Egyptians have been making for 3,000 years.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

The stele was significant, for it was an independent verification of Israel's existence. It was dated to the latter part of the 13th century BCE, which meant that the Exodus must have happened earlier. Most biblical scholars subsequently dated it to the middle of the 13th century BCE. However there were, and still are, skeptics who refuse to believe that there was an Exodus. Some scholars believe that the group known as Israel had been in Canaan all along.

Recently, it was announced that new evidence was found for the existence of Israel. Once again it came from ancient Egyptian sources. It was found on an inscribed statue base that had been in the Berlin Egyptian Museum for decades but had been overlooked until two scholars re-examined it and saw what they believed to be the name of Israel. Remarkably, it was 200 years older than the Merneptah Stele and has been dated to the 15th century BCE. If this is true, then it has all sorts of ramifications for the Exodus and the origins of Israel.

When I asked the eminent Egyptologist Donald Redford about the new find, he was skeptical. He mentioned that the pronunciation of Israel is different than that on the Merneptah Stele. Now only one thing is certain, and that is that the debate is far from over.

The privilege of preparing

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

It seems that once we get anywhere near Tu b'Shvat, we already sense Pesach slowly approaching. Certainly as Purim draws near, we feel the Pesach reality coming into focus. Most assuredly, when Purim has come and gone, we're dreading the fast-approaching Pesach preparations, and before we can blink, Pesach has arrived.

Preparations for Pesach can be quite onerous, leaving us anxiously awaiting seder night, if only to put an end to preparation. At that point, it is what it is. But in today's world of multi-focusing and multi-tasking, where we must enact laws to stop doing 15 things at once (such as texting while driving), we should regain our focus around Pesach.

Pesach is a time of rejoicing and a recurring experience of redemption. There aren't too many things in our lives to which we can attach such meaning. In terms of preparation, I advocate separating spring cleaning from Pesach preparation. Spring cleaning focuses on actual cleaning. It's concerned with rearranging rooms and wardrobes in an "out with the old and in with the new" approach. Pesach preparation has everything to do with understanding the things that weigh me down and how I can rid myself of them, while feeling more and more liberated as I go. I'm not concerned with cleaning, which addresses the past mess, as much as I'm concerned with preparing, which addresses what's coming in the future.

The Shabbat after Purim is called Shabbat Parah. Its Torah portion deals with the ritual of the red heifer, which is performed when someone has been classified as "tameh met," ritually impure due to contact with a dead body. It's the most drastic of all ritual impurities, and it prohibits that person from participating in the Pesach sacrifice or ritual. The only way to rid oneself of this ritual impurity is through the unusual red heifer ritual.

Interestingly, in the book of Numbers, when Moses reminds the Israelites that Pesach is approaching and that they need to begin their preparations, a group of men approaches him with an unusual question. They're ritually impure due to contact with a dead body and thus not able to participate in either the preparations or the actual Pesach sacrifice that the rest of the nation is involved with. They ask Moses why they should be deprived of this privilege.

Their very question speaks volumes to us. It wasn't any easier in the ancient world to prepare for Pesach than it is in the modern world. Remember that as Israelites in the wilderness, they didn't have non-Jews to sell their chametz to. They had to actually get rid of it. And yet the general view was that preparing for Pesach is a privilege and sitting together for a ritual of redemption is a privilege.

At times we can become overwhelmed with the amount of work involved in preparing for Pesach. We need to remind ourselves that the ancient Israelites considered it a privilege and argued to be included. The midrash teaches us that the one who loves commandments will never be satisfied with commandments. They are our vehicle of growth, and having them in our lives is indeed a privilege.

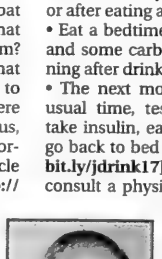
Purim and drinking

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz



A person is obligated to drink on Purim until one no longer knows the difference between "cursed be Haman" and "blessed be Mordechai." – Talmud, Megillah 7b

"If all drinking does is make you sick or do stupid things, then it goes against everything that Purim is about. If you are planning to drive, or you know that drinking can otherwise get you in trouble, then alcohol might as well be pork juice." –Rabbi Tzvi Freeman [http://bit.ly/jdrink11]

How to reconcile those two statements! You've got to be pretty out of it to confuse your feelings about Haman and Mordechai! And that's a recurring problem during Purim when otherwise moderate drinkers use the holiday to drink to excess, sometimes with horrific consequences. In recent years, rabbis, community leaders and other Jewish organizations have been spreading the word about what the mitzvah really means and how to observe it safely.

Dr. Moshe Werzberger tells this chilling story, "As I was driving on Shabbos, rushing an intoxicated, unresponsive teenager who was vomiting blood to the ER, the absurdity of the situation was painfully evident to me. Here was a young student who together with some friends at an Oneg Shabbos had, without any second thought, drunk himself to the point of endangering his life. Yet, on Purim we allow our children unrestricted access to alcohol, endangering their lives." [http://bit.ly/jdrink22]

Alcohol is no stranger to Shabbat and all the Jewish festivals, but what is its special connection to Purim? Rabbi Howard Jachter explains "that the miracle of Purim came about to a great extent due to parties where alcohol played a central role. Thus, we consume alcohol on Purim in order to remember the great miracle brought about by alcohol." [http://bit.ly/jdrink23]

So how do you reconcile the Talmud's dictum about Haman and Mordechai? Many traditional and contemporary commentators suggest that you should drink [wine] until you become drowsy and are unable to distinguish between the Book of Esther's villain and hero. [http://bit.ly/jdrink25]

Purim can also present particularly large challenges to certain people. For recovering alcoholics, this holiday can be offer unwanted temptations as Shmuly Rothman describes in My Non-Alcoholic Purim [http://bit.ly/jdrink21]

The Jewish Diabetes Association's Purim page explains that certain diabetics should never drink. Others must take special precautions:

- Plan to have your drink with a meal or after eating a snack
- Eat a bedtime snack (solid protein and some carbohydrate) in the evening after drinking.
- The next morning, get up at the usual time, test your blood sugar, take insulin, eat breakfast, and then go back to bed if you feel ill. [http://bit.ly/jdrink17] If you are diabetic, consult a physician before consuming alcohol.

Hatzolah, the voluntary emergency medical service organization, has published a Purim Safety page that focuses on both alcohol and other holiday safety reminders, including the need to be careful as children may be darting from cars while helping to deliver mishloach manot. [http://bit.ly/jdrink18] They add, pointedly, "Don't get carried away this Purim!" [http://bit.ly/jdrink19]

In order to put the holiday into perspective, I'll return to Rabbi Freeman for the closing words: "Purim is not about drinking. Purim is about being drunk with sincere happiness."

Have a joyous and safe Purim.

Memories of old Toronto

Ellen Weiser
Special to The CJN

If you're a baby boomer, or more accurately, a Toronto baby boomer, undoubtedly you have fond memories of a time and a place that live only in our dreams. Let me take you back to where I'm constantly accused of living – in the past.

Guest Voice

If nothing else, it was cheaper.

For myself in the 1950s and '60s, going out to eat was as rare for me as the proverbial blue moon, as seldom as a Leafs Stanley Cup victory. When it happened, it was a time to cherish. And if you lived in the north (that being Eglinton Avenue and above), you definitely had your share of gastronomic hangouts. Around the area where the Allen Road now meets Eglinton was a lovely little place called The Menorah, which met its demise when they started construction of the expressway. You could get a full-course meal for two bucks and change – soup, a main course and dessert. As for kishke, there was none finer – okay, maybe the kishke at the Noshery, further east on Eglinton.

If you continued your journey along Eglinton Avenue West, you'd eventually find Joe's and Moe's delicatessen. The "Moe" of that establishment was my uncle. No bias here, but he made the best corned beef sandwiches in the city at the inflated price of 40 cents per.

Within walking distance of J & M was Bagel King. My parents and the parents of my friends all had a yearning for the strawberry shortcake garnished with berries that looked as if they were on steroids. More often than not, you'd have to order one in advance. If you waited until the craving hit, you would very likely have been out of luck.

The Eglinton Avenue strip was my home away from home in the '50s and '60s. You had groceries, a bakery and a movie theatre all within about a block of one another. My father would do his weekly shopping at the Power store where not only did you get your groceries but also those infamous Gold Bond stamps. It was my job to paste the stamps into the book each week and dream about what I'd get when it was time to redeem them.

The Health Bread bakery was just a stone's throw from the Power store. For those of us who weren't in geographic proximity to the College Street store, this was the place to go for baked goodies. I remember always asking for a gingerbread man – not that I liked gingerbread – but my passion was for the sugar-coated face on the top. If this wasn't available, there were cookies, my favourite being a shortbread type with pink colouring. The chocolate roll was also in the top ten. I suppose it was in my best interest that my dentist was also located on Eglinton!

Jewish Toronto of old included Shopsy's and the Victory Theatre.

Once we'd had enough to eat, we would catch the latest flick at the Nortown theatre, 25 cents for kids, and if the munchies hit, you could get a box of popcorn with the clown's face for a dime. After the movie, there was the Town Restaurant where I first enjoyed that fine delicacy, french fries with gravy. Oh, for those days when we didn't even know (or care) what a calorie was!

Having completed our tour of the north end, let's make our way downtown where many of you spent your childhood. Along Spadina Avenue, we would come across the original United Bakery. Yes, it's still alive in Lawrence Plaza, the plaza that everyone said would fold after Yorkdale opened. However, the old UB got its atmosphere from "the boys" from the shmatte factories. When that was combined with cheese blintzes and a side of sour cream, it was something that was lost after the move.

We had our choice of delis on Spadina, Shopsy's or Switzer's. Shopsy's made a great hot dog, not to be outdone anywhere – that yummy poppy seed bun with all the compulsory toppings. For corned beef, pastrami and the rest of the deli meats, it was a toss-up as to which of the two restaurants made the better sandwich. I'll leave it to my readers to decide on the winner. Of course, before leaving either or both establishments, you had to pick up a Chicago 58 vursht, either for salami and eggs or to grill until it was burnt. Please note, doing it in the microwave doesn't count. Now that was haute cuisine!

If you had your fill of deli and were in the market for something less ethnic, you could try Basil's at Yonge Street and Gerrard Avenue. Known for its breaded veal cutlet, it was the place for Sunday dinner. Dessert was either Boston cream pie (my favourite) or rice pudding (for my parents) and you got change from a five-dollar bill.

I'm making myself sad as I write this, but on the other hand, I feel a sense of happiness in being able to share these memories with you and almost hearing the sighs of "Oh yeah," as we go from one lost-but-not-forgotten Toronto landmark to the next.

It was a great time, a simpler time, a very special time.

If you weren't brought up in the city during this era, this gives you an idea of what you missed. If there are any of you whose favourite place I didn't mention, I apologize. However, I now have the privilege of being able to say, "I'm 60," which now grants me automatic forgiveness for my memory's shortcomings.

To my fellow baby boomers and baby boomers at heart, I dedicate this article. I hope that at least a few of you can say, "Yes, I remember."

Donation to Salvation Army leads to a chain of social change

Lawrence Merkur's gift in perpetuity will help generations of those in need

By Daniel Horowitz

When Toronto's Lawrence Merkur passed away in 2008 at the age of 54, the reclusive and compassionate man with a penchant for cats left an unknown fortune to Toronto's Salvation Army, creating an unusual "marriage" of sorts.

The day after his death, it was discovered that Merkur - an active and extremely successful trader in the silver market since 1990 - had amassed thousands of ounces of silver, worth between seven and eight million dollars.

And, as it turned out, his death had a silver lining for the Salvation Army and the tens of thousands of men, women and children among Toronto's hungry and homeless individuals.

Thanks to Lawrence's brother Ephry, Beth Tzedec's Rabbi Baruch Frydman Kohl and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, our city's more than 21,000 vulnerable Jewish residents are also receiving the benefits.

"My brother, Laurie, as we called him, was greatly affected by the death of his sister, Carol Merilly Merkur, who died in 1958 at just six months old," said Ephry. "He was very sweet and caring, and the death of our sister, and later, the death of our father, really changed him. He became more introverted and lived a very, very frugal lifestyle. You would never know he had a nickel, let alone millions in silver."

In his will, Lawrence left the silver to the Salvation Army in trust, for perpetuity, meaning that it will continue to assist our city's most vulnerable for generations to come. And, typical of Lawrence, he didn't want to have his name attached to the gift – the largest single donation made to the Salvation Army in Canada. Instead, he wanted the donation to honour the memory of his late sister and a cousin who passed away at age 11, Sydney Eve Atin.

"The challenge was to figure out the best way that this donation could help Toronto's vulnerable citizens," says Ephry. "I suggested that perhaps we purchase a refrigerated truck to deliver fruit and other foods to those who needed it. That's what we did, and today we have three huge trucks that continue to distribute food to the homeless."

Another challenge confronting the Merkur family was how the Jewish community in need could also benefit from Lawrence's gift.

"I tried a number of Jewish organizations to help me, but with no luck," says Ephry. "Then, I went to my rabbi, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl who connected me with UJA in 2010. It was a perfect fit. UJA was so organized and equipped to make this happen, while The Salvation Army was so wonderful to work with and so open to our suggestions, they even purchased kosher food for the first time. It was around that time that the Pride of Israel food bank was running out of food and was on the verge of closing down. Just imagine the faces of those who, without warning, suddenly saw a huge refrigerated truck backing up at Beth Shalom, as pounds of kosher foods appeared out of nowhere. It was a pretty incredible and rewarding sight to see."

In 2011 alone, more than 100,000 pounds of kosher food was delivered through the Salvation Army to low-income Jewish families.

"This was a very unlikely Shidduch," said Kim Smiley, Director, Capacity Building for Social Services, UJA. "It took over two years to materialize, but with Ephry's persistence, we have collectively created a game changer in the field of poverty alleviation. It was a chain of social change: Through Lawrence Merkur's generosity to The Salvation Army; through Ephry Merkur's connection to Rabbi Frydman Kohl; to the Rabbi's connection to UJA Federation; to UJA's partnership with local providers in the city which assist those struggling with poverty, including Pride of Israel's Kosher Food Bank and the Food Bank at Beth Shalom."

"Laurie has done so much more than help the needy - he has forged a relationship between interfaith organizations and community members who may have overlooked their common bonds in helping the poor," says Jordan Atin, Lawrence's first cousin, and the executor of his will. "To do so in the name of two girls, his sister, Carol Merilly and my sister, Sydney Eve Atin, both of who died at very young ages, is a remarkable tribute."

Jewish Free Loan Toronto – new name, same commitment to Jews in need

By Daniel Horowitz

Jews have always felt the responsibility to take care of one another.

Many who immigrated to the shores of Toronto in the early 1900's to escape persecution in Europe, arrived with little or no money and needed to seek out entrepreneurial opportunities which were financed by the first incarnations of communal loan societies. Often, it was one family offering small loans to other families to help them get started. Looking back, this was the birth of the micro-loan.

Fast forward over a hundred years and into a new millennium, and Jewish Free Loan Toronto, formerly known as Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa, continues the work of our ancestors, albeit with a new name and a new commitment to spreading the word about this vital organization that continues to improve the lives of countless Jews across the Greater Toronto Area.

Michael Freedman

One of the reasons for the name change is simply few understood what "Cassa" actually meant.

For the record, it's German for "cash box".

"We've changed our name, but, philosophically, nothing has changed about Jewish Free Loan Toronto," explains the organization's new executive director, Michael Freedman. "We are still here to help those members of the Jewish community who are in need by providing them with a hand-up, not a hand-out."

And, with the recent instability in the global economy, and with approximately 10 percent of the GTA's Jewish community living at – or below – the poverty line, the need to spread the word about Jewish Free Loan Toronto has never been greater.

The organization, a partner agency of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is located in the Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services on Sherman Campus. UJA Federation, along with United Way of Greater Toronto, provides funding towards the agency's operating costs.

It offers three types of loans: personal, education and small business start-up.

In 2011, Jewish Free Loan Toronto – then still known as Cassa - gave out loans ranging from $5,000 to $15,000 to 92% of applicants. Loans given to 153 individuals totaled $833,000 and currently the organization has $1.4 million worth of loans in circulation to 490 individuals. Loans are available to Jewish residents of the GTA who are Canadian citizens or permanent residents of Canada.

"We do a good job of getting our name and our services out to the community, but not a great job," says Freedman, a 53-year-old father of two and a native of New Brunswick. "Clearly we'd like to believe that every Jew across the GTA is doing well financially, but we know that there are many who need our services. There are too many others who don't know what we offer. I love the fact that, once a loan is paid back, that money is automatically placed back into the pool, and is ready to be loaned out again, to help others. To know that the work we do results in a perpetual circle of assistance, is truly rewarding. And, like with all non-profits, much of our success is due to the tireless efforts of our incredible volunteers."

Ironically, when Freedman heard the Jewish Free Loan Toronto was looking for a new executive director, it was the fact that he knew so little about the organization that sparked his interest in the job.

"I have been involved with a number of charitable organizations for years, both inside and outside of the Jewish community, and yet I was unaware of the full spectrum of what Free Loan does," he says. "That's why I took the job; the more I learned about what Jewish Free Loan Toronto offered, the more I knew that we had to spread the word about this incredible organization and increase the number of loans we provide."

"One of the most rewarding aspects of this job is when we see people who, at one time, came to us for a loan, come forward now to donate money to our organization," says Marlee Petroff, who has worked for Free Loan for 25 years. "It really says a lot about our Jewish community; that they are always wanting to give back, and they never forget who was there for them, when they needed help."

Theatre company reaches out to Israeli community

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israeli-Canadian project director Galya Sarner believes there is nothing that brings people closer than arts and culture.

Sarner is a promoter of the four-year-old Mifgash Theatre, which is presenting a play by the late Israeli playwright Moshe Shamir called He Walked Through the Fields. She hopes this production will build on the efforts to connect Israeli immigrants to the Toronto Jewish community.

The Mifgash Theatre, Toronto's only Hebrew-language theatre company, was established in 2008 as part of a larger initiative to reach out to the growing Israeli-Canadian community, many of whom felt disconnected from the larger Jewish community.

Sarner, who referred to the community theatre project as "one of her babies," said that presenting Israeli culture to Torontonians is a dream come true.

"My philosophy is that there is nothing better than bringing people together through art and culture," she said, adding that she studied theatre when she was in university.

"There are a lot of talented people in our Israeli community and we have professional actors and actresses, as well as volunteers, and that is the beauty of it."

She added that while the play is presented in Hebrew, there are English subtitles for members of the community who don't speak the language.

Adding a personal touch to the upcoming production is the fact that the play is directed by Yael Feingold, daughter of the late Shamir, who, in addition to being a writer, was also a former Knesset member.

Galya Sarner

"I think it's going to be very special because it was and still is one of the most successful plays in Israel, but it actually reflects in many ways our own Israeli Jewish identity," Sarner said.

The play, which runs from May 20 to 24 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, is about a young sabra, a native Israeli, who falls in love with a Polish Holocaust survivor on the eve of the War of Independence. He becomes torn between staying with his family and fighting in the Palmach.

Ran Mesterman, who wears many hats for federation, serves as the chair of the Israeli Forum Committee and was federation's first Israeli member of the board of directors.

He said he's proud of what the Mifgash Theatre has achieved.

"I think the [Mifgash Theatre] has done tremendously good, and I was amazed to see the amount of people who are joining the program – not only the people who are coming to see the show, but the people who are volunteering to be a part of the show," Mesterman said, adding that all of the past shows had sold out.

"It's really amazing to see how much it is necessary."

He said that although many of the Israeli division of federation's initiatives have been successful, he feels there is potential to reach out to many more Israelis.

"We found two major arenas in the Israeli community [that have succeeded]. The first and most important one is education and the second is culture," he said.

Through initiatives such as Kachol Lavan, a supplementary school for children from junior kindergarten to Grade 8, as well as the Mifgash Theatre, which is part of the Hamifgash program at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, many Israelis have become involved with the Jewish community, Mesterman said.

"The Israeli community is special in a way that they form many small groups, and they feel they don't need other parties... They don't necessarily understand that the federation is giving the actual infrastructure for it to be successful."

As for the future of federation's Israeli division, which represents 50,000 to 60,000 Israelis living in the Toronto area, Sarner said the community seems to be getting younger.

"I think more and more young adults are moving to Toronto – I would say young professionals around 27, 28. They're looking for a better future, they're looking for job opportunities, social opportunities, and we cannot ignore this fact."

Mesterman said now that the educational and cultural approaches have proven to be successful, he has ambitions to work on the business side and to engage Israelis who want to network.

"I'm trying to find people who want to take the initiative to reach out to Israeli people and to get the message out that... we want them to become part of the infrastructure that we've built over the past few years. It's taken us a lot of time and we've worked very hard for that," Mesterman added.

RAISING AWARENESS: Bnei Akiva Schools was among hundreds of high schools across North America to participate in Sharsheret's Pink Day on Feb. 29 to raise awareness about breast cancer and Sharsheret's vital programs and services. In total, over $220 was raised in support of this national not-for-profit organization, which supports young Jewish women and their families facing breast cancer. Pictured, from left, are Yechiel Rosensweig, David Suttner, assistant principal Nicky Kagan, Nadav Erlich, Baruch Margolis, Ofek Laikin, Aryeh Forman, Shimmy Jesin, Ariel Shields, Yaakov Green and headmaster Rabbi Scot Berman.

Netanyahu expressed relief at being able to spend time in a country so strongly allied with his own.

"When we speak about the difficulties and troubles in [the Middle East], it is particularly encouraging to come to Canada, and later on to the U.S., and know that I stand among friends who share the same values and goals. You are such a friend. I look forward to our conversations," he said.

Netanyahu said he has been speaking out on the dangers of Iranian plans to acquire nuclear weapons since his first tenure as the Israeli prime minister 15 years ago.

"As we see that the timeline is advancing and the distance to Iranian nuclear capability is decreasing, we understand that this could happen. The danger is not only to Israel," he said.

Netanyahu said the world has to look only at what Iran does without nuclear weapons to understand that with them it would become even more menacing.

"It gives Hezbollah in Lebanon tens of thousands of rockets. It's in Afghanistan, the Horn of Africa, the Arabian Peninsula, it's even in South America. It threatens to choke the world oil supply by closing the Strait of Hormuz," he said. "They send their own children into minefields. They hang gays, stone women. Imagine what a regime like this would do if they had atomic weapons? I think it would be a… great danger to all the nations of the world."

The two leaders continued to have private talks over the weekend.

On Sunday, Netanyahu gave a breakfast briefing to some 80 representatives of the Canadian Jewish community from organizations including the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) – which organized the event on behalf of the Israeli Embassy – B'nai Brith Canada, the Jewish National Fund and Israel Bonds. He then left for meetings with U.S. President Barack Obama in Washington to again discuss the Iranian threat.

According to CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel, the breakfast gathering with Netanyahu, which was closed to media on Sunday, was "unusually informal" and conducted in a question-and-answer format.

"He spoke about Iran of course, emphasizing that the international community must not allow Iran to use talks to camouflage its ongoing drive to nuclear capacity. He also addressed issues of Israeli pluralism and democracy," Fogel told The CJN.

Netanyahu also spoke about relations between his nation and Turkey, as well as Israel as an emerging energy power and the false "notion of Israel's isolation within the international community," Fogel said.

According to Fogel, the Jewish community leaders were "very happy" to connect with Netanyahu. "Overall, it was a very successful encounter," he said, adding that Netanyahu extended an open and standing invitation to Harper to visit Israel, although there appear to be no immediate plans for such a trip.

Despite his staunch support of the Jewish state, Harper has yet to visit Israel.

Speaking before his meeting with Jewish leaders in Ottawa on Sunday, Netanyahu praised Obama's earlier speech at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) conference in Washington and said he greatly appreciated the U.S. president's statement on Israel's right to defend itself against any threat.

Netanyahu highlighted Obama's statements that Iran should not be permitted to develop nuclear weapons and that all options should remain on the table to prevent it from doing so. Netanyahu added that he expected to discuss these issues with Obama on Monday.

Immediately after his speech at the AIPAC conference, Obama met for 35 minutes with Israeli President Shimon Peres. The two discussed both Iran and the Palestinians. After the meeting, Peres spoke by phone with Netanyahu and updated him on the meeting with Obama.

"It was an excellent meeting with President Obama," Peres said. "He reinforced the things he said in his speech and went into more detail. I left with the feeling that he is determined to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons and he is very serious. Obama told me that Israel's security is an American national security interest… He is sharply clear and is not playing politics."

Choir director named a Top 25 nominee

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — At 88, Elizabeth Wolak has done time in a Russian forced labour camp, acted as assistant conductor at the Krakow State Philharmonic, emigrated from her home in Poland to Australia and later to Canada and led countless students through piano lessons.

She has put her musical skills to work by creating and leading four Vancouver Jewish choirs since 1963, and today, she is shortlisted as a finalist for the 2012 Top 25 Canadian Immigrants for her work as cultural ambassador to the Jewish community.

"When I look back at my whole life, I can say I did a lot," Wolak says. "But I miss the choir work."

She went into forced retirement in 2008 after several members of her choir, the Shiron Singers, were unable to commute to the evening practice sessions. The Shiron Singers, the fourth choir Wolak has created and led since arriving in Vancouver, lasted 26 years.

Wolak's interest in Jewish music did not begin until after she left Poland as a young adult. She started her piano studies at the age of six and was a teen when the war began. When she was 16, she and her parents worked in a Russian forced labour camp, a time she describes as "terrible."

"All the young girls my age were given 'light' work," she says. "That meant cutting small trees, which were used to repair the road."

After the war, the family returned to Poland to find that their extended family, with the exception of one cousin, had been murdered in the Holocaust. Wolak enrolled in Krakow's Jagiellonian University and graduated with a master's degree in English and musicology. She also received a diploma in choral conducting and music pedagogy from the Krakow Conservatory of Music.

"Poland became much more antisemitic after the Nazi occupation than it had been before," she recalls. "It was really difficult, and at the advice of my father's friends, we changed our name from Waldman to Vishnovsky in order to sound more Polish."

Under her new last name, Wolak was appointed assistant conductor at the Krakow symphony and was able to hide the fact that she is Jewish.

By then, she had met her future husband, Edward Wolak, and the couple knew they would marry and live abroad.

"I couldn't stand the situation in Poland," she says.

Her fiancé had papers to Canada, but she did not. So, he and Wolak moved to Australia in 1960, where they married, and not long after, they immigrated to Canada.

With her, she brought an antique Bluthner piano that she cherishes to this day, a gift from her father when she graduated from university.

Wolak's interest in Jewish music was born in Australia, when she was approached by the North Shore Temple Emmanuel and invited to work as choir director. "It was a very good choir and I really enjoyed it," she reflects. "My husband had always been certain that once I left Poland, I'd be connected to religious music, and he was right, I got into it right away."

Not long after stepping off the boat in this country, she was approached by the Jewish Community Centre, asking her to start a Jewish Community Choir.

Passionate about Jewish music, Wolak formed a 35-person choir, and through it, made many of her closest friends in the city. In later years, she would form a choir for Vancouver's Temple Sholom, be asked to experiment with a choir at Congregation Shaarei Tzedek ("it failed because they would not allow a woman to conduct the choir," she says) and in 1981, form the Shiron Singers.

With the Shiron Singers, she led performances of Jewish music before mainstream audiences including thousands at Vancouver's 1986 Expo.

"We made people appreciate Jewish music," she says. "I was told several times over the years that although people did not understand the words of the Jewish music, which were sung mostly in Hebrew and some in Yiddish, the music itself spoke to them because it is so full of feeling. I think that was our biggest achievement."

Life in Vancouver was not easy for Wolak. Edward died suddenly in 1979, leaving her a widow with two sons to raise alone. She made ends meet by teaching piano, grateful that she had had the foresight to complete her studies in Poland so that she had a career to fall back on in later years.

The Top 25 Canadian Immigrants is a peoples' choice award that recognizes individuals who have come to Canada and made a positive difference living here. Canadian Immigrants is a magazine for new Canadians. Winners will be announced at the end of May 2012 and will be recognized with a commemorative plaque. RBC has pledged to donate $500 to a charity on behalf of each winner. New Montreal rabbi hopes to 'open doors'

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As a former Rhodes Scholar who also has a PhD from Oxford, Rabbi Lisa Grushcow might naturally have chosen the life of an academic.

As a proud gay woman, that might have been the easier route.

"But as soon as I got a taste of the congregational rabbinate, I knew it was what I wanted," said the Canadian-born Rabbi Grushcow, who will become the senior rabbi of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom July 1, succeeding Rabbi Leigh Lerner who is retiring.

She is not only the first female senior rabbi at the 130-year-old temple, but of any large congregation in Canada comprising more than 1,000 member families.

Rabbi Grushcow is also Canada's first openly gay congregational rabbi. She will be coming to Montreal with her spouse, Rabbi Andrea Myers, and their two young daughters.

Trailblazer, however, is not a label Rabbi Grushcow cares to trumpet.

"I hope I will not be regarded as a female rabbi or a gay rabbi," she said in an interview. "I am here to be a rabbi. I think people quickly respond to you for who you are when you are at home in your own skin.

"We may raise some eyebrows, but we were received with warmth," she added, referring to her visit last month to the temple to be formally introduced.

She could have stayed in New York, where since 2003 she has been an associate rabbi at Congregation Rodeph Sholom, a historic temple with about 1,700 members on Manhattan's Upper West Side.

She and her spouse are active in gay rights issues in New York, and lobbied New York State for the legalization of same-sex marriage, which was enacted last June.

Rabbi Myers, who was raised a Lutheran in Long Island, N.Y., is the author of the 2011 memoir The Choosing: A Rabbi's Journey from Silent Nights to High Holy Days.

Rabbi Lisa Grushcow, incoming senior rabbi of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom is greeted by congregants.

But the opportunity to lead the temple, Montreal's sole Reform congregation, was one Rabbi Grushcow could not pass up. Born in Ottawa and raised in Toronto (she is "just under 40") – which will make her a rarity as a Canadian leading a major shul in her own country – Rabbi Grushcow earned her undergraduate degree at McGill University in the 1990s and became enchanted with Montreal and its strong Jewish community.

"You don't see this kind of Jewish life in many places. It may be a lot smaller than New York, but I do not feel that Montreal is lacking at all." The temple announced her appointment Dec. 1.

The couple's union was sanctified in New York in 2001, and, in 2003, soon after Ontario legalized same-sex marriage, they went to Kingston, where they were married by Rabbi Justin Lewis, then of the Reform Iyr Ha-Melech Congregation.

It was also the year Rabbi Grushcow was ordained at Hebrew Union College in New York.

Having a spouse who is also a rabbi (she was ordained at New York's Academy for Jewish Religion), Rabbi Grushcow feels is fortunate, because she intimately understands the job.

Rabbi Myers is not expected to play a specific role at the temple, although she likely will be looking for teaching opportunities.

Rabbi Grushcow, whose parents and other relatives live in Toronto, was raised in the Conservative movement and attended Beth Tikvah Synagogue. While at McGill, she went to the Reconstructionist Congregation Dorshei Emet. She moved to the Reform movement while in England.

Her impression of her new congregation, which has just over 1,000 member families, is that it is "dynamic and diverse." A goal is to make it even more inclusive. As its new president Stephen Yaffe noted, the congregation is still large, but it is aging.

Led by Rabbi Lerner for 23 years, the temple is liberal. Same-sex and interfaith marriages are performed there, if there is a commitment to create a Jewish home, (although its rabbis do not co-officiate with clergy of other faiths, a policy she will continue), and LGBT and mixed couples are welcome.

"As the only Reform congregation, the temple is in a unique position to open doors to those who do not have a place elsewhere in the community," Rabbi Grushcow said.

"The Bible speaks of Abraham and Sarah's tent being open on four sides. That's a fitting image of offering different ways in."

Rabbi Gruschow's colleague will be Rabbi Julia Appel, who joined the temple last summer as full-time outreach rabbi.

Rabbi Grushcow has a keen interest in interfaith relations (her academic research was in the beginnings of Christianity and rabbinic Judaism), and will be back March 28 to speak at a national Christian-Jewish consultation event at McGill.

She believes it's important for "progressive" religions to have a voice in Quebec where secularism is so highly valued and religion has become "a straw man."

She also looks forward to forging ties with her rabbinic colleagues of other denominations, as she has in New York.

Encouraging Jewish learning is another of her priorities, but Rabbi Grushcow says no one should be intimidated by her scholarly background. "There's an old saying: People need to know you care before they care about what you know.'"

She does hope to guide those who want to become more literate in a Judaism that's relevant to the modern world or who are attracted to an intellectual pursuit of the religion. "I'm a great believer in lifelong learning," she said.

"In my first year, I expect to watch and learn, to have conversations with congregants and leaders. I want to respect where they want to go," Rabbi Grushcow said.

"I come from a community where the building is always full of people of all ages and who have come by different ways. I hope to bring that kind of energy here."

Canadian play about Mideast in Israeli festival

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Michael Nathanson and his play Talk are both about to make their debuts in Israel.

The play, about two longtime friends whose differences about the Middle East situation ruin their friendship, is the only foreign play to be staged at this year's Stage One English Theater Festival in Jerusalem from April from 8 to 10.

Michael Nathanson

All the other playwrights are Israeli, says Nathanson, who is the artistic director of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT).

"I was stunned, but pleasantly so," says Nathanson, on being approached to have his play mounted in Israel. "They contacted me in mid-December. We had some back and forth, and I had to provide a film clip of two actors reading the parts in a scene."

Nathanson began writing Talk in 2001. It's based on a correspondence that he had with a longtime friend in the aftermath of the attack on the Twin Towers on Sept. 11, 2001.

"I was living in New York at that time and was supposed to be downtown that morning, but my plans fell through," he recalls. "A week or two later, I received an e-mail from a friend of about 16 years who was living in Europe.

He e-mailed me a copy of the infamous article in The New Yorker by Susan Sontag, blaming the attack on America's foreign policy. He also forwarded me an e-mail by a university professor who was strongly pro-Palestinian. The gist of it was that all of the problems in the Middle East are Israel's fault.

"I couldn't understand this. It was all nonsensical. It got me to thinking about my now former friend and wondering how well we really know anyone else," Nathanson says.

"The play does what I intended it to do. It's not a polemic. It is entertaining and engenders discussion. While politics provides the sizzle, it is more about the end of a friendship."

Talk premièred at the WJT in 2007. The play was published in 2009 and nominated for a Governor General's Award in 2010. Since then, Talk has been staged at Toronto's Harold Green Jewish Theatre (in March 2010) and at the National Arts Centre Festival in Ottawa (last April).

"We have also had readings in Los Angeles and New York over the past couple of years," the Winnipeg playwright says.

Nathanson is in his sixth year as WJT's artistic director. The WJT, which is celebrating its 25th anniversary next season, is doing very well. "Last year, our audience increased by 50 per cent over the year before," he says. "We are getting a more diverse and younger audience who get what we are doing and appreciate it.

"And a second play we did last year [Lenin's Embalmers] was also nominated for a Governor General's Award. For a theatre our size to have had two plays thus recognized in three years is unprecedented."

The WJT's next production will be Angels in America, opening in April. "Judging by the early response, this will be the best-attended play we have ever put on," Nathanson says.

He is currently working on a new play – and he is looking forward to two weeks in Israel. "After the performances, I am looking forward to taking some time to see Israel," he says.

MONTREAL — Not sure if that ketchup is kosher? Wondering where the nearest kosher hot dogs can be found?

Well, there's an app for that now.

The Montreal Vaad Ha'ir has just launched a mobile application for its MK kosher guide that can be downloaded free of charge to a portable electronic device. It's available through the Apple App Store and the Android Market.

The Vaad is working on getting it for BlackBerry, too.

This is a first in Canada, said Vaad executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel, and an advancement on similar apps created by some kashrut supervisory organizations in the United States.

All of the 30,000 products from around the world bearing the MK hechsher are accessible by category (baked goods, for example), specific type of food, or brand.

Tolerance and freedom: lessons for Israel

Guest Voice

Jacob Ziegel

The Jewish and secular media in North America have been exposed for many months now to reports from Israel about women (including haredi women) being forced to sit at the back of public buses that were also occupied by haredi men; of haredi extremists humiliating a young Orthodox Jewish child in Beit Shemesh, on her way to school, because, in their closed minds, she was indecently dressed; of haredi rabbis threatening commercial advertisers in Jerusalem with boycotts of their products if they did not remove pictures of women in their advertisements; of other Jewish fanatics desecrating Muslim mosques in Jerusalem and elsewhere in Israel. Other haredi rabbis have urged their adherents not to rent or sell their properties to Muslims.

The list of intolerant behaviour by extremist religious groups in Israel continues to grow and, though these incidents may be far removed from the broad spectrum of Israeli norms and opinion, it conveys the impression of a society deeply divided about fundamental values.

Regrettably, the religious intolerance is not confined to Israel and examples of it can also readily be found in the Jewish community in Canada. A recent example illustrates the problem. It involves a new book by U.S.-based Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, Kosher Jesus, in which, its detractors claim, Jesus is described in sympathetic terms and as supportive of talmudic teachings and values. Nevertheless, the book was denounced by Toronto based Chabad Lubavitch Rabbi Immanuel Schochet as "heretical"; he also decreed that "it is forbidden for anyone to buy or read this book or to give its author a platform in any way, shape or form to discuss this topic."

I haven't read the book and am very unlikely to do so. I'm also willing to concede the Boteach book may be naive in its interpretation of the New Testament and the true character of Jesus' teaching. Nevertheless, Rabbi Schochet's condemnation of the book and the use of his authority to prevent other Chabadniks from reading it is totally incompatible with Canadian democratic values and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedom. The rabbi's cherem also belies Canadian society's confidence that mature Canadian adults, whatever their religious and secular backgrounds, are quite capable of forming their own judgments. Sadly, Rabbi Schochet's condemnation also brings to mind the appalling conduct of the Amsterdam Jewish community in 1656 in publicly excommunicating Baruch Spinoza from their midst, and (apparently) subsequently forcing him to make a humiliating apology as a condition of his reacceptance as a member of the Jewish community. Spinoza, as CJN readers will know, is widely hailed as one of the founders of modern rationalist philosophy.

Religious intolerance is not confined to Israel and examples of it can also be found in the Jewish community in Canada

These continuing struggles, in and outside Israel, to establishing religious tolerance within the Jewish community should be contrasted with the recent seminal decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in an appeal brought by two Catholic parents against the decision of the lower courts in Quebec. Until 1995, the Quebec school system was divided along denominational lines, and Catholics and Protestants had their own school systems and operated their own schools. Supported by an amendment to the Canadian constitution, the Quebec government then decided to secularize the school system and the denominational school boards were eliminated.

At the same time, the Quebec educational authorities felt the need to replace the former religious instruction offered by the denominational schools with a mandatory humanistic program that would expose all the students in the secular school system to an appreciation of the importance of ethical values in Quebec society and the roles played by the diverse religious and racial communities in the Province.

Some Catholic parents objected to the new program and claimed that it violated their exclusive rights as parents to determine their children's religious culture and upbringing as protected by Section 2 of the Canadian Charter. Reading between the lines of their complaint, it is clear the parents were also concerned that the children's Catholic value system would be diluted by exposure to the multifaith program sponsored by the Quebec Department of Education.

All nine judges of the Supreme Court unanimously rejected the argument in a decision released on Feb. 16 (S.L. & D.J. v. Communite Scolaires des Chenes, 2012 Supreme Court of Canada decisions). The judges found that the parents had adduced no evidence that the new program interfered with their religious freedom or their parental right to continue to bring up their children in the Catholic faith. Importantly, the two written opinions of the judges stressed the "new reality" in Quebec and Canadian society, a society comprising many different cultural, religious and racial elements. Inferentially, at least, the judgments also commended the Quebec government for seeking to ensure that future generations of Quebec schoolchildren would be aware of this cultural and religious diversity and would learn to appreciate, respect and value these elements.

The Supreme Court's decision and Quebec's admirable educational initiative contain many lessons for Israel and, for that matter, Canada's Jewish community as well. At the present time, Israel's school system, though ostensibly under government control and largely financed from public funds, is still heavily organized along denominational and sectarian lines. We can be sure, too, that the more than 100,000 haredi schoolchildren learn nothing about other value systems in Israeli society, much less the importance of accepting them as an integral part of Israel's pluralistic society. The position may not be much better at the other religious schools.

Israel's problems, however, go much beyond its divisive school system. The problems generated by a deeply fractured electoral system and the capacity of minority parties to hold up other party leaders to ransom is still more serious. Still, a start has to be made somewhere, daunting though the challenge may be.

I believe a much higher level of democracy and cultural tolerance would be achieved in Israel if, at a minimum, the Israeli cabinet could be persuaded to adopt a mandatory educational program of religious and cultural tolerance for the next generation of Israeli schoolchildren at state-operated and state-supported schools, comparable to the program now in progress in Quebec.

Those who think this goal is too utopian should worry how Israel will survive as a democratic and liberal state if the strongest bond uniting its citizens are the threats from outside the country and not the values they share from within.

Cotler 'byelection' calls subject of probe

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler welcomed a Canadian market research industry association's announcement that it will investigate complaints about misleading phone calls made to his constituents last November on behalf of the Conservative Party.

The Marketing Research and Intelligence Association (MRIA) said last week it was striking a three-person complaint resolution panel to investigate the six formal complaints of professional misconduct it received from members of the public and one member firm.

The complaints were made against an MRIA member Campaign Research Inc., which was hired by the Conservatives to poll Mount Royal voters.

The company's callers allegedly falsely informed Mount Royal residents that a byelection was imminent in their riding because, they said, Cotler was stepping down and asked if they would support a Conservative candidate.

The Conservative government acknowledged it was behind the polling, but defended it as legitimate voter identification research. The party did not agree that the conversations proceeded exactly as claimed and made no apology.

The Mississauga, Ont.-based MRIA describes itself as a not-for-profit voluntary association with more than 1,800 members working in the market information and survey industry.

Irwin Cotler

In December, House of Commons Speaker Andrew Scheer described the Mount Royal telephone campaign as "reprehensible," but for technical reasons said it was not within his jurisdiction rule that the veteran Liberal MP's privileges had been breached, as he claimed.

Cotler described the ruling as "a moral victory," although he disagreed with Scheer's conclusion that the evidence contradicted Cotler's contention that disseminating false information adversely affected his ability to carry out his parliamentary duties.

MRIA executive director Brendan Wycks told the media that, before moving to form the complaint resolution panel, the Ottawa-based Campaign Research was given 30 days to find a mutually acceptable resolution with the complainants, but that process was unsuccessful.

If it finds fault with the company, the MRIA panel can recommend censure, membership suspension, or expulsion.

Neither Wycks nor MRIA communications director Anne Marie Gabriel returned calls by The CJN's deadline.

Marian Levy, a Mount Royal constituent who e-mailed the MRIA in December, said she had no doubt that the pollster who called her told her that a byelection was coming in Mount Royal, even after she argued with the caller that this could not be true.

After Scheer's Dec. 13 ruling, Interim Liberal Leader Bob Rae wrote to Marc Mayrand, the chief electoral officer of Canada, asking that he refer the matter to the commissioner of Elections Canada for formal investigation.

Rae noted that Section 92 of the Canada Elections Act states that "No person shall knowingly publish a false statement of the withdrawal of a candidate."

While the calls were not made during an election campaign, Rae wrote that he believes the situation is analogous because "Conservative operatives [were] conducting a campaign to deliberately misinform voters."

Rae also wrote that consideration should be given to amending the Elections Act to explicitly prohibit knowingly spreading misinformation that a candidate or officeholder has withdrawn, whether or not an election campaign is on.

Cotler said a response to Rae's request is still pending.

As for the current robocall controversy, Cotler said his office was told by some constituents that during the federal election campaign last spring, they received live phone calls purportedly being made on behalf of the Liberal Party and providing them with "misleading information" about their voting poll's location.

Not only were these bogus, but they were offensive to Jewish constituents because some received those calls on Shabbat or Passover, Cotler said. The caller's or callers' identification could not be traced, he said.

Cotler's campaign office in Cavendish Mall in Côte St. Luc was closed on those days, he noted.

His campaign officials filed a complaint with Elections Canada at that time.

Are you on the hook for retroactive child support?

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 31 years

Question: Several years ago, when I separated from my wife I earned $50,000 yearly. Over the past five years my income gradually increased each year. I now earn $110,000 yearly. My ex-wife and I have two children and I have been paying child support under the Child Support Guidelines based on my former income, without any increases. Our separation agreement did not impose any obligation on me to advise my wife of any of my income increases.

She recently sent me a letter requesting that I increase my child support and demanding that I disclose any increases in my income since we separated. I now have two new kids and any retroactive Order will affect their lifestyle. How does the Supreme Court of Canada decision in DBS v. SRG affect me? Are the headlines correct? Am I now on the hook retroactively for five years of increased child support in a lump sum?

Answer: No. Almost all of the media reports have exaggerated the impact of this decision. You are likely limited to paying retroactive child support for up to a maximum of three years before the date of "effective notice." Effective notice means the first time your ex broached the subject of an increase. In your case this was the date you received the letter from her. If you received the letter on, let's say, June 1, 2011, then you would be on the hook for retroactive child support for the period of June 1, 2008 to June 1, 2011. For others, effective notice may have been a telephone call.

Moreover, if you had attempted to intimidate her by threats or coercion or refusing to disclose your true income when asked, then support could be pushed back further. If you had a legal obligation to provide this information, say as written down in a separation agreement or Court order, then the start date for retroactivity could well be pushed back to more than three years before the effective date of notice since the payer — in this case you — should have provided such data but failed to do so.

For payers who fail to provide income info when they are legally obligated, or who lie about their income, or who threaten or intimidate the recipient, then it is not up to three years before the date of "effective notice" but rather up to three years before the date of "blameworthy conduct."

But the Court also said something helpful for payers with a second family. Yours may prevent a Court from hitting you with the whole retroactive amount if ordering it affects the welfare of your new children.

"Zero Tolerance" Feedback

My recent article "The Problem with Zero Tolerance in Domestic Abuse Cases" sparked a great deal of comment and interest from readers, mostly very positive. Readers should be aware that the occassional flagrant and unjust conduct by the authorities, usually against men, in such cases recently hit the headlines when the Waterloo Regional Police strip-searched and briefly threw in a jail cell a completely innocent father, Mr. Jessie Sansone.

Mr. Sansone did not own any firearms but he was deemed by the Police to be "guilty" of the fact that his four-year old daughter had drawn her Daddy shooting "monstors and bad guys" in her kindergarten class.

Without searching his house or conducting any investigation whatsoever, his children were immediately seized by Children's Aid while he was incarcerated and embarrassed by this degrading strip search. The Police Chief's apology does not suffice. Clearly the way in which Zero Tolerance is enforced as a policy needs to be re-examined, without endangering its benefits.

Strengthening Canada-Israel academic ties

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Two delegations of Canadian university presidents and professors were in Israel recently to learn about higher education here and to explore opportunities for academic co-operation.

The visits came despite the anti-Israel fervour now playing out on campuses around the world.

"Academic boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel never came up during the visits," Prof. Benjamin Ehrenberg, Bar-Ilan University (BIU) vice-president for research, said. "The Canadians only spoke about efforts to establish good relations with Israel."

Canada and Israel have strong bilateral relations and share political, economic, social and cultural ties. Israeli ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, with the help of the Foreign Ministry, set in motion the two visits to build an academic relationship.

The Canadian guests visited BIU, IDC Herzliya, the Weizmann Institute of Science, Tel Aviv University and the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology.

One delegation consisted of journalists, journalism professors and spokespeople from Canadian universities. They visited four Israeli universities and colleges to learn about journalism programs and journalistic practice in Israel.

"I see great opportunities for the University of King's College to forge partnerships for student and possibly faculty exchanges," Kim Kierans, vice-president of the Halifax university, said. "There is no doubt that King's students would benefit enormously from a term of study in Israel and vice versa."

Also taking part in the mission were Marsha Barber, a professor of journalism at Ryerson University; Linda Kay, chair of the department of journalism at Concordia University; David Swick, an assistant professor of journalism at King's College; Brian Gabrial, a journalism professor at Concordia, and Prof. Kenneth Bell, of the University of Regina.

"It was tremendous to experience the country first-hand and learn more about the complexities of Israeli politics and culture. I was impressed with the quality of discourse in the English-language media when it comes to both diversity and depth," Kierans said.

Another delegation, comprising high-ranking university officials, included Prof. Irving Abella, J. Richard Schiff Chair of Canadian Jewish History at York University; Harold Edward Campbell, president and vice-chancellor, University of New Brunswick; Amit Chakma, president and vice-chancellor, University of Western Ontario; Vianne Timmons, president, University of Regina; Paul Henry Davidson, president of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC); Eleonora Christina Vanderberg, of AUCC, and Michael Goldbloom, principal and vice-chancellor, Bishop's University.

They met with lecturers and researchers in engineering, law, brain research, nanotechnology and communications.

"They were very impressed with Israeli science, not just at BIU. But you don't have to market Israeli science – Israeli science already has a good reputation," Ehrenberg said. "We know Canadian science is good, too. Israeli scientists would feel very comfortable with Canadian scientists, especially because they're known, like other Canadians, to be real friends of Israel."

Ehrenberg said that Israel and the United States, as well as Israel and the European Union, already share "real collaboration in science." He added that for a true Canadian-Israeli academic project, governments need to show monetary support.

"You need to put in money in research," he said. "In order to have a good collaboration with Canada, we need the government to establish a fund that would finance such a foundation. We're not talking about millions. An average research grant doesn't need to be more than $50,000 a year."

Timmons said that "for the University of Regina, there is interest in the area of justice and police studies. There is much we can learn from the work undertaken by Israel academics. Israel is a leader in innovation, and Saskatchewan has identified innovation as a priority. We can learn from the investments made in this area. I was impressed with the work being undertaken in academia in Israel."

And though Timmons came to advance research collaboration with Israeli institutes, it is at her university that the students union recently passed a motion to support the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement.

"The University of Regina Students Union is an independent organization," she said. "The University of Regina will not be endorsing this motion. We are not in favour of an academic boycott."

Can't have Purim treats? Think again!

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Desserts usually play a supporting role, capping the meal as dinner or lunch comes to an end.

But on Purim, desserts play a starring role, with the mishloach manot platter often the centrepiece.

People rarely need an excuse to eat sweets, and they welcome Purim because it offers them a licence to indulge.

The nice thing about the holiday is that there is usually a variety of treats in bite-size form. Dessert aficionados can try an assortment of goodies without going overboard.

Nevertheless, many weight-conscious people don't feel comfortable eating the desserts, because the offerings are too rich. But the platters can also provide lighter fare everybody can enjoy.

Others who might feel excluded are people with celiac disease who can't eat gluten, and those with wheat sensitivities. Hamantashen are off the menu for them, but there are a variety of desserts that they can consume.

The following treat recipes are suitable for both weight watchers and those with celiac disease. For the latter group, these food items should be served on a separate platter away from gluten goodies.

These recipes come from Rose Reisman Brings Home Spa Desserts: Low Calories Recipes from Top Resorts Made Easy (Andrew and McMeel, 1991). Many of the recipes were later republished in Robert Rose's Favorite Light Desserts (Robert Rose 1998).

VANILLA ALMOND SNAPS

1/2 cup blanched almonds, finely ground
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 cup sugar
2 egg whites
2 tbsp. sugar

Preheat oven to 275. Line a cookie sheet with parchment paper sprayed with non-stick vegetable oil.

Combine almonds, salt and 1/4 cup of sugar in a bowl. In a mixer, beat egg whites and 2 tbsp. sugar until stiff peaks form. Add egg mixture to the almonds and sugar and combine until all the ingredients are blended.

Local doctor recognized for work on diabetes

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Dr. Bernard Zinman, 68, director of the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes and senior investigator at the hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, says he is "humbled" by his recent appointment to the Order of Canada.

Dr. Bernard Zinman

At Mount Sinai Hospital since 1990 and a professor of medicine at University of Toronto, Zinman, a native of Montreal, was recognized for his achievements in diabetes patient care and research.

He was principal investigator in the Diabetes Control and Complications Trial, which showed that keeping blood glucose levels as close to normal as possible slows the onset and progression of eye, kidney and nerve damage caused by diabetes.

The aim of his research is to develop new therapies that treat diabetes, and to improve care and quality of life for people with diabetes.

Zinman, who is married, and has three children and four grandchildren, said he has won awards before, "but this is not just a medical award. This recognizes my contribution to the country and to my lifetime achievements. I'm fortunate to have worked in a great institution with great collaborators."

It is gratifying, he said, to see diabetes so highly recognized. "Globally, it is an epidemic. By 2030, about 500 million people worldwide will be affected by [the disease.] It is increasing in both developing and developed countries.

"Diabetes is the disease of the 21st century, and it will surpass the health and economic implications of AIDS."

For the first time, he said, the United Nations has recognized the impact diabetes has on people's lives and on the economy. "The cost of managing [the disease] is huge. It is the lead cause of blindness and kidney failure, and it is taking its toll globally."

Zinman said diabetes is affected by both genetics and environment. "We can't change our genes, but we can change our environment. Reasonably modest changes in diet and lifestyle, though, can help [turn things around.] By reducing body weight by seven per cent, diabetes can be reduced by 58 per cent, but changes are hard to implement."

Type 2 diabetes used to be a disease of the elderly, he said, but people are getting it younger and younger. "The duration of diabetes is a big factor in developing complications. Someone who gets it in their 30s or 40s is at a significant risk."

Type 1 diabetes, he said, which used to be called juvenile diabetes, "is a different type of diabetes. It is due to an autoimmune destruction of the beta cells that make insulin. It occurs in young, healthy children who need insulin to survive. To them, insulin is a lifesaver."

He said certain societal changes can help curb Type 2 diabetes. "We need communities that are designed to facilitate walking. We also need to make the caloric content of fast foods more readily available, and cut out supersized portions. If we curb the obesity epidemic, we can curb diabetes."

Pelvic-floor exercises

Do you know where your pelvic floor is? Did you know men have a pelvic floor, too?

The pelvic-floor muscles help support the bladder, intestines and uterus and stabilize the lower pelvis. The pelvic floor looks like a hammock of muscles that hold the pelvic organs in place. Weak pelvic-floor muscles can cause pelvic organ prolapse, pain in the groin or lower back and incontinence in both women and men.

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

Kegels or pelvic-floor exercises can help change all that. Kegel exercises, or pelvic-floor muscle-strengthening exercises, were developed by gynecologist Dr. Arnold Kegel (1894-1981).

A strong pelvic floor is important for good health both in men and women especially as we age. Kegel exercises help increase core strength while improving bladder and bowel function. Strong pelvic-floor muscles help support the lower organs, reducing the risk of prolapsed organs. Kegel exercises help develop a stronger back support, which improves posture and reduces lower-back pain.

Performing Kegels is easy and can be done anywhere. For women, just try to contract the muscles you would use to stop urination. You will feel your pelvic muscles squeeze your urethra and anus. If you feel your stomach or butt muscles contract, then you are using the wrong muscles. Try again, once you have found your pelvic-floor muscles, squeeze and hold them for three seconds, then release. Do that 20 times in a row about three times a day.

For men, the easiest way to find these muscles is during urination. Just stop the flow of urine halfway through, and don't squeeze your butt, stomach or legs to do so. Once you can slow down or stop your urination, then you have found your pelvic-floor muscles. Contract these muscles for five seconds, then release slowly, repeat this 10 times three times a day. The more you do this exercise, the stronger your pelvic floor will be.

All options on the table for Iran: Obama

JTA

WASHINGTON — It's still possible to resolve Iran's suspected bid for a nuclear weapon through diplomacy, but a military option is also still on the table and containment is not an option, President Barack Obama said last weekend.

"I firmly believe that an opportunity remains for diplomacy, backed by pressure, to succeed," Obama told the annual American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) policy conference on Sunday in Washington.

"The United States and Israel both assess that Iran does not yet have a nuclear weapon, and we are exceedingly vigilant in monitoring their program," he said. "Now the international community has a responsibility to use the time and space that exists."

These comments did not earn applause – there have been reports that Israel and AIPAC are pressing Obama to make the military option more explicit.

Ratcheting up the military threat later in the speech, Obama earned a standing ovation after saying that his policy is to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon.

Most of the applause that Obama sought–and received – throughout his address came from statements related to support for Israel. But the one that was most meaningful, and that earned the approval of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, had to do with Israel helping itself.

"Iran's leaders should have no doubt about the resolve of the United States, just as they should not doubt Israel's sovereign right to make its own decisions about what is required to meet its security needs," the U.S. leader said.

"I have said that when it comes to preventing Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, I will take no options off the table, and I mean what I say. That includes all elements of American power: a political effort aimed at isolating Iran, a diplomatic effort to sustain our coalition and ensure that the Iranian program is monitored, an economic effort to impose crippling sanctions, and, yes, a military effort to be prepared for any contingency.

"Iran's leaders should know that I do not have a policy of containment; I have a policy to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon."

Netanyahu, responding to the speech, said in a statement from Canada: "I appreciate that Obama reiterated his position not to allow Iran to develop nuclear weapons and that all options are on the table on this issue. I also appreciated the fact that he made it clear that when it comes to Iran acquiring nuclear weapons, containment is not an option. Perhaps most of all, I appreciate the statement that Israel must be able to defend herself against any threat."

Netanyahu and Obama were scheduled to meet Monday in Washington, and Netanyahu was to address the AIPAC conference later that day.

In praising Obama's commitment to Israel's security, American Jewish Committee executive director David Harris said in a statement that the president's address gives "strong hope that President Obama and Prime Minister Netanyahu will see eye to eye, built on a foundation of mutual trust, on the best path to preventing Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons capability."

Putin is good for Israel, Russian analyst says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

MOSCOW — Vladimir Putin is good for Israel, a top political analyst said Sunday evening, as Russians elected the prime minister to his third non-consecutive presidential term at the Kremlin.

"It has always been important for him to maintain good ties with Israel and Russia's Jewish community," Stanislav Belkovsky, founder and director of Russia's National Strategy Institute, told Ha'aretz.

Belkovsky explained that a healthy relationship between Russia and Israel would also be important for any other Russian president. "Even if another leader were to replace Putin, he would be loyal to Israel, because these days Muslim immigration is a bigger problem for Russia than antisemitism, and that is the dynamic that will develop. Islamophobia will intensify, antisemitism will erode."

The political analyst also explained that Russian arms sales to Syria – a point of tension between Israeli and Russian officials – were not directed against Israel.

"Simply, the quality of Russian weapons has deteriorated to a point where that is the level of customer that remains. It is a matter of choosing the only possible customer, and without customers for Russia's military products, he [Putin] will be forced to retrench hundreds of thousands of people working in the industry, which would stir commotion."

When asked about Putin's relationship with the West, Belkovsky explained that "the West was always willing to come to terms with Putin, because his stable reign served the interests of western corporations, and a power struggle with citizens of the state will destroy their status."

Complaining of widespread fraud in Sunday's election, in which Putin received more than 63 per cent of the nationwide vote, Putin's opponents said they didn't recognize the results and would rally near the Kremlin Monday evening.

But the former KGB spy, who after four years as prime minister will be returning to the post he held from 2000 until 2008, said with tears rolling down his cheeks that he had won a "clean" victory.

"I promised you we would win. We have won. Glory to Russia," Putin, dressed in a parka and flanked by outgoing Russian President Dmitry Medvedev, told tens of thousands of flag-waving supporters on Sunday night under the Kremlin's red walls.

Belkovsky explained why Putin appointed Medvedev as prime minister. "Medvedev proved his full loyalty... But how long Medvedev's cabinet will hold is unclear, because its professional potential is not high, and the scope of problem demands of the staff a high level of proficiency," Belkovsky said.

Following the official announcement of his win, election monitors said voting was skewed in Putin's favor. "There was no real competition, and abuse of government resources ensured that the ultimate winner of the election was never in doubt," Tonino Picula, one of the vote monitors from the Organization for Security and Co-Operation in Europe, said in a statement.

Monitors also called for alleged electoral violations in Sunday's election to be thoroughly investigated.

Humanitarian aid offered to Syrians by Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman has directed Eviatar Manor, head of the ministry's international organizations branch, to offer the International Red Cross humanitarian aid to Syria, a spokesman for Lieberman said on Sunday.

The Red Cross replied that it is still evaluating the humanitarian situation in Syria and what supplies are needed, and will respond in detail.

"The Jewish state cannot sit idly by while horrific acts are taking place in a neighbouring country and people are losing all that is dear to them," Lieberman said. He added that even if Israel can't intervene in the internal affairs of a country with which it has no diplomatic ties, it is its "moral duty to at least offer humanitarian aid and call on the world to put a stop to the massacre."

On Saturday, Lieberman told Bulgarian President Rosen Plevneliev that Israel would extend humanitarian aid to Syrians during the conflict there as soon as it is asked to do so. Lieberman, who was in Bulgaria on an official visit, also told the Bulgarian president: "We must not abide the bloodshed that is going on there and the daily killing of innocent people."

Avigdor Lieberman

Last month, Lieberman proposed in various government forums that Israel condemn Syrian President Bashar Assad's killing of civilians and call on Assad to resign. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak rejected Lieberman's proposal.

Netanyahu reportedly believes that a public statement by Israel on the issue could play into Assad's hands, allowing the Syrian president to say that Israel was behind the insurrection against him.

On a tour of the north last month, Lieberman said: "The fact that Arab MKs [members of Knesset] have not condemned what is happening in Syria is real treason, both against the Arab nation and Syria's citizens, as well as against the State of Israel. These are the same MKs that go wild over the destruction of every illegal structure, but are silent when thousands of innocent civilians are killed."

Ethiopian aliyah to rise

Israel will increase the number of immigrants from Ethiopia for the next several months after bringing in far fewer than Ethiopian advocacy groups had expected. Some 1,000 Falash Mora, Ethiopians whose ancestors converted from Judaism to Christianity, will be brought to Israel over the next four months, about 250 per month. The Israeli government in October 2010 reportedly had agreed to bring in 200 Falash Mora each month for a year, and then the remaining of those eligible until the last 4,500 approved for immigration were in Israel by March 2014. About 110 have been arriving each month. The government has said it cut the number it was bringing due to dwindling available space in absorption centres. The Ethiopians are waiting in a refugee camp in Gondar province before coming to Israel.

Envoy presents credentials

Israel's new ambassador to Egypt presented his credentials at a ceremony in Cairo. Yaacov Amitai is the first Israeli envoy named to Egypt since the ousting of president Hosni Mubarak one year ago. The Israeli national anthem was played at the Feb. 27 ceremony, as is customary, as were the national anthems of the 13 other ambassadors that presented their credentials to Field Marshal Mohammad Hussein Tantawi, chairman of the Supreme Council of the Egyptian Armed Forces, according to Israel's Foreign Ministry. Israel's Foreign Ministry said the presentation of credentials was held in "a cordial atmosphere." During speeches at the ceremony, both Amitai and Tantawi emphasized the importance of the peace agreement and co-operation between their countries.

Iranian elections weaken Ahmadinejad

Avi Issacharoff
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Preliminary results from Iran's parliamentary elections indicate that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's has, as expected, lost a significant amount of support. Many of his allies were replaced by other conservatives who belong to rival camps.

On Saturday, the Iranian media praised the high voter turnout, despite calls by the reformist camps to boycott the elections. During the run-up to the elections, the regime tried to emphasize the importance of voting in light of the "critical" days Iran is facing. Even the wife of one of the slain nuclear scientists was called to the propaganda campaign. And Ayatollah Makarem Shirazi, one of the most prominent clerics in Iran, published a fatwa saying that those who do not vote are committing a sin.

There were almost no candidates from the reformist camp, as two of its leaders, Mir Hossein Mousavi and Mehdi Karroubi, have been under house arrest for more than a year. Former president Mohammad Khatami took part in the elections, disappointing many in the opposition, as did the rival of Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, former president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani.

Yet the results don't come as a surprise – Khamenei has been planning to target Ahmadinejad politically. Khamenei has taken issue with the president, who he sees as overly independent. One of the incidents that exacerbated the tensions was Ahmadinejad's effort to fire the intelligence minister, who Khamenei wished to keep at his post.

Despite various reports in the West, the political battle in the parliamentary elections was not between Ahmadinejad's camp and Khamenei's camp – also because the former's allies had almost no chance in the ballot.

Rather, two rival camps had set their sights on politically "eliminating" Ahmadinejad, and both are avid supporters of Khamenei: one is the United Front of Conservatives, which includes some well-known politicians such as Ayatollah Mohammad Reza Mahdavi Kani. The second camp, the Stability of Islamic Revolution Front, contains some of the most extreme, almost messianic politicians.

The two camps are united on Iran's nuclear program, as well as opposing Ahmadinejad and backing Khamenei.

Hungarian writer seeks asylum in Canada

JTA

BUDAPEST — Award-winning Hungarian-Jewish writer Akos Kertesz has confirmed that he has applied for political asylum in Canada.

Harassment and threats following the author's controversial statements about Hungary's role in the Holocaust have led him to seek asylum in Canada, the Hungarian News Agency reported.

Kertesz's said in a statement released to the media that "a political campaign was mounted against him, not only by the Budapest city hall but also from within the government and parliament."

The origin of the controversy was an article Kertesz wrote in the American Hungarian-language newspaper Amerikai Nepszava, in which he said that Hungarians alone can now be blamed for the Holocaust because they, unlike the Germans, have failed to admit to and to repent for their crimes. He also referred to Hungarians as "genetically subservient" due to the fact that they "do not feel the slightest remorse for the gravest of historical crimes, they shift their responsibility to others and always put the blame on others."

Kertesz later cut the phrase "genetically subservient" from the article but it did not prevent the Budapest City Council from stripping the writer of his honorary citizenship. The writer's statement also said the current right-wing government has "launched a witch hunt and fuelled the extremists" and that the 80-year-old Kertesz has been "subject to constant harassment and threats. He was attacked in the street and he thought his life was in jeopardy."

Israelis bring trauma expertise to Japan

Boaz Arad
JTA

SENDAI, Japan — Tears run down the face of Kohata Yuriko as she recalls the events of March 11 last year, when a massive 9.0-magnitude earthquake struck off the coast of eastern Japan in the early afternoon.

Shopping for groceries in the small fishing town of Iwanuma, she heard the tsunami sirens.

Realizing she had little time, Yuriko collected her son and 93-year-old father and fled. As her foot hit the gas pedal, she could hear the horrible noise of the wave as it came crashing through the neighbourhood.

Later that day, Yuriko learned that a grandmother and her grandson, a good friend of her son's, perished in the neighbouring house as the tsunami smashed into it. Upon hearing the news, her son started to cry.

"Thank you, mom," he said again and again. "Thank you for coming back for me."

Through an interpreter, Yuriko says she still cries all the time when she's alone.

"I'm so stressed and nervous that I can hardly breathe," she says.

But with the assistance of volunteers and post-trauma experts from the Israeli non-governmental organization IsraAID, she is beginning to learn to cope with the tragedy.

Yuriko is sitting on the floor of a caravan converted into a community centre in one of the temporary housing sites built to accommodate the tens of thousands of tsunami survivors who lost their homes to the wave. Helped by the aid workers, she dances, bangs on drums, laughs and smiles – and then, asked to choose from a pile of special cards used as psychotherapeutic tools, she begins to cry.

It is the first time since the disaster that she has cried in front of someone, and Yuriko is apologetic. She has been unemployed for nearly a year, shares a cramped temporary housing unit with her father, husband and son, and constantly feels like she is about to faint from anxiety.

"It's OK to cry," says Judy Spanglet, an Orthodox Israeli social worker and family therapist who has worked with trauma victims all over the world. "It's perfectly normal. Let it out. You have been so busy worrying for and taking care of other people that you have forgotten to think of yourself."

Yuriko lets out a big smile. Suddenly, she seems relieved.

"Thank you for listening," she says, sighing. "Until now I didn't really have anyone I could speak to."

The Japanese government has worked to clean up the material damage from the tsunami and find housing for those it left homeless. The government has been less determined in providing survivors with needed psychological support. A number of volunteer groups, most of them Japanese, have worked to fill that hole, running community-based support programs focused mainly on fun activities for children and the elderly. A few, however, have dug in deeper.

IsraAID, a humanitarian organization funded by a number of North American Jewish federations, is one of them. Arriving in Japan shortly after the disaster, IsraAID's small team of volunteers has supplied medical relief items, provided training to handle post-traumatic stress disorder and organized art, music, movement and drama therapy sessions for residents of the many small towns devastated by the tsunami.

The sessions, which use a mostly non-verbal approach to help people express their feelings, have been so successful that IsraAID is now planning to operate a training centre for at least another year and a half. The NGO was honoured for its work recently by the Japanese Chamber of Commerce in New York.

"Israel, sadly, is pretty much a trauma lab," says Meirav Tal-Margalit, an IsraAID volunteer and therapist who has worked with domestic-abuse victims and residents of the rocket-stricken Israeli town of Sderot.

"We have extensive experience in this field, and the tools we use here have been proven effective worldwide," he adds. "We make cultural adaptations, of course, but in the end we are all human, and we share the same fears and the same dreams."

It is a tight operation, run by two people: project manager Yotam Polizer, a 28-year-old social worker who spent the last few years volunteering in Nepal, and project coordinator Celia Dunkelman, an energetic Indonesian-Jewish musician who grew up in Japan and functions as both translator and co-ordinator. Polizer shuttles almost weekly between workshops in affected towns and meetings with ministry of health officials in Tokyo.

"The main idea behind our activities is to supply the Japanese with the therapeutic tools and the know-how to help them deal with the trauma themselves," Polizer says. "We locate local community leaders and professionals from the health and education sectors, and work directly with them. They then use what they learn and pass it on to many more people than we can reach on our own."

One of these local leaders is Chiho Shimura, an independent event organizer from Tokyo who was so shaken by the disaster that she left her business to volunteer with survivors in her native Ishinomaki, a port city of 164,000. Ishinomaki was so badly devastated by the tsunami that nearly a fifth of its population now lives in temporary housing.

Some survivors, tired of waiting for the temporary shelters to be constructed, returned prematurely to their partially destroyed houses, living in some cases with no heat or running water. Shimura has been running a support centre for them, supplying warm clothes, mobile heaters and food.

"I had a storm raging inside me for a very long time," she says. "And then, in the first IsraAID workshop I participated in, it finally came out. I cried like I have never cried before, and it was so relieving. We've had Japanese social workers come here and talk to people, but they were not able to do what the Israelis have done. They immediately saw into our hearts. They definitely saw into mine."

IsraAID, Shimura adds, is different than the other aid groups that have come to Ishinomaki, delivered their donations, made a speech, took some pictures and left.

"They don't just keep coming back," she says. "They come whenever we need them, even on the weekends. They have become a part of this place."

Israel appoints first Ethiopian-born envoy

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel has appointed its first Ethiopia-born ambassador.

The appointment of Belaynesh Zevadia as Israel's envoy to Ethiopia was announced Feb. 28.

Zevadia also was the first Ethiopian Foreign Ministry cadet. She made aliyah at the age of 17 and studied at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, earned a bachelor's degree in international relations and African studies and a master's degree in African studies. She has worked as a diplomat in Chicago and Houston.

"This is proof that in Israel, opportunity is available to everyone – native Israelis and new immigrants alike," Zevadia said.

Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said in a statement that Zevadia's appointment "conveys an important message to Israeli society, which is currently dealing with the issue of racism toward Ethiopians in Israel." He added, "I am certain that she will represent the state with honour and be a source of pride to all Ethiopian Israelis."

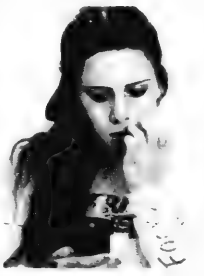
Israeli cellphones to carry warning label

Ronny Linder-Ganz
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A bill requiring all cellphones sold in Israel to bear a health-hazard warning label passed its first of three readings into law last week.

The bill, sponsored by Knesset members Dov Khenin of the Hadash party and Yulia Shamalov Berkovich of the Kadima party, won blanket approval in parliament. It also requires all advertisements of mobile phones to bear the warning.

Although the jury is out on the science, some suspect that heavy cellphone use may cause cancers, particularly in children. Youngsters can be more vulnerable to carcinogens because of their faster rate of cellular division.



Oh, oh. That cellphone may be a hazard to your health. [FLASH90 photo]

The labels will read, "Warning – the Health Ministry cautions that heavy use and carrying the device next to the body may increase the risk of cancer, especially among children."

Nor is that all: similarly to cigarettes, all cellphone advertising targeting minors would be banned under the law, and breaking the law would be a criminal offence.

"The bill that passed today is a breakthrough in expanding public awareness of the possible risks in using cellular phones," Khenin said after the vote. Given the "worrying results" of a number of Israeli and international studies, it is incumbent on the government to bring the possible risks to the public's awareness. People need to be more careful in their use of cellphones and especially, they must protect children, he said.

The Forum of Cellular Companies responded that they adhere to all the safety directives handed down by the Health Ministry and the Environmental Protection Ministry. "Beyond that, we believe that new initiatives and recommendations in the areas of public health and safety should be handed down by the professionals in these areas, based on the scientific know-how in Israel and the world," the Forum stated.

Unemployment hits 32-year low

TEL AVIV — Unemployment in Israel fell to a 32-year low in 2011 despite the economic troubles shaking the world, which have hit Israeli exports and slowed economic growth.

Last year unemployment averaged 5.6 per cent of the adult workforce, compared with 6.6 per cent the year before, according to the latest figures from the Central Bureau of Statistics.

The last time unemployment sank that low was in 1978. The figure then was 4.3 per cent of the adult workforce.

The statistics bureau said the actual number of people meeting the criteria to be officially considered "unemployed" – which include actively seeking work – fell to 180,000 on average in 2011. That's a drop of 14 per cent from the year before.

The rate of unemployment among men plunged from 6.8 per cent to 5.6 per cent. Among women, the rate fell by 6.5 per cent to 20.2 per cent.

The state of the economy, as far as the jobless are concerned, improved dramatically last year. The bureau's figures show that 5.6 per cent of the country's unemployed had spent more than a year looking for work, down from 22.4 per cent in 2010.

GE invests in biomedical innovator

Yoram Gabison
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Check-Cap, developer of an imaging capsule for the early detection of colon cancer, has acquired a powerful strategic partner: the General Electric group recently bought five per cent of the company's shares, Biomedix Incubator announced.

Biomedix has an indirect 6.3 per cent stake in the biomed startup through Spearhead Investments.

It is believed GE's investment was executed at a company value of 170 million shekels ($44 million, all figures Cdn), the value at which Check-Cap raised 35 million shekels ($9 million) from private investors last March.

Guy Neev, CEO of Check-Cap, said the company plans to raise $20 million to $25 million in a private share offering to institutional investors, investment funds and U.S. strategic investors. The proceeds from the offering, to be led by Citigroup, are expected to finance all the company's needs until clinical trials are completed and applications for the capsule's approval in Europe and the United States are submitted, he said. Check-Cap's imaging pill is designed to provide three-dimensional images of the colon. After the capsule is swallowed, it passes naturally through the digestive system and is excreted. The capsule includes an X-ray source within a radiation shield that enables the escape of electromagnetically charged particles through perforations in the optic device that directs and filters the rays.

The rotation of the perforations around the capsule's axis generates a series of angled scans to produce a virtual reconstruction of a section of the colon. This is used to discover and evaluate polyps, fleshy growths in the lining of the intestine. Polyps are normally dormant, but have a 10 per cent chance of becoming cancerous if they exceed 10 millimetres.

Check-Cap claims the advantage of its capsule over existing procedures, such colonoscopy, virtual colonoscopy, and the video camera pill developed by Given Imaging, is that it doesn't require prior cleansing of the digestive system or a hospital visit. It thereby allows patients to continue their daily routines without interruption.

Neev estimated that, 36 million people in higher risk age groups in Europe, Japan and the United States should undergo colon examinations each year. Only 50 per cent of Americans and 25 per cent of West Europeans do, because of the uncomfortable preparation process needed before a colonoscopy, which Check-Cap's capsule should alleviate.

Over the past year, Neev said, Check-Cap has focused on reducing the capsule's size in preparation for clinical trials. The first trials will include 50 to 60 people and are expected to start in Israel and Europe within three or four months.

Oded Meirav, manager of the GE Global Research technology centre in Israel, said the company decided to invest in Check-Cap due to its impressive progress in minimizing the size of its nuclear camera. He said Check-Cap's technology is similar to technology used by other nuclear medical systems, including GE Healthcare's systems, for examining bone density.

In addition to its financial investment, GE will provide Check-Cap with miniature imaging detectors for use in its capsules.

Finding the things in life worth fighting for

Mordechai Ben-Dat
Editor

Except in the fabled classics of western literature, where plot often spans continents and generations, themes canvas ultimate issues of the human condition, and dialogue echoes the grand ideas of philosophy, modern fiction writers tend to be more circumscribed in the sweep of their narratives.

Perhaps due to the "competing" immediateness of television, movies and computers, so much of our popular fiction tells tales of conspiracies to harm the world and heroism that saves it. The stories may succeed as entertainment but do not reach higher or leave their mark in our memory banks as literature.

Wendy Dubow Polins, a debut novelist from Boston, has just carved a mark considerably above the usual reach of the modern fiction writer. Her recently published novel, Fare Forward (Hamilton Hall Press), aspires high and reaches high.

It tells a story of a young woman, Gabriella, who must unravel secrets of family, of life, of human history, of heaven and stars before she is finally free to walk the path of her own destiny. Her story, like the stories of all of us, begins before her birth with her parents and grandparents, all of whom play critically decisive roles in helping determine Gabriella's ultimate destination.

At its core, Fare Forward is essentially an exploration into the existence and nature of the human soul. But the readers are not plunged into the murky, neo-theological, self-help swimming pool – shallow or deep end – of New Age doctrine. Rather, Polins imaginatively, painstakingly and effectively weaves together disciplines of science, theology, history and esthetics into a thoughtful discussion-excursion into the mysteries of human life in general and the purposes of each of our lives specifically.

In an introductory note, Polins tells the reader, "In this novel, I have been inspired by the many and sometimes inconsistent theoretical ideas that are offered in physics, literature and ancient mystical texts."

Her inspiration brings the reader to a thought-provoking literary destination where we travel in the company of historic figures such as Albert Einstein; the Jews who lived and died at Masada, and a cast of compelling characters such as the vivacious and artistic Gabriella; her parents, who live in the mystics' Galilean city of Safed; her grandmother, Sophie, whose extrasensory powers channel both past and future; her grandfather, who has a Nobel Prize in chemistry, and a mysterious time traveller.

At its narrowest level, Fare Forward tells a story of international intrigue that threatens certain individuals and perhaps even the western way of life. But at its most expansive, it is a story of love in its most profound manifestations, as well as a reflection on the place of finite, single human life in the infinite flow of time and space. In the pages of Fare Forward, Polins reflects on the power of esthetics, whether of poetry, music, art, architecture, and even of the esthetics of science.

Not surprisingly therefore, she pays great attention herself to the esthetics of her writing and not simply to the force of the narrative. Thus we read elegantly evocative passages such as the following reflection by Gabriella as she lies in bed preparing for sleep: "I notice the white light the moon makes on the ocean, like a path to infinity."

As the action reaches its full denouement near the end of the story, we are given to understand with full clarity one of the key messages of the story. "It's for love. That's what we're here for. All of us. And love is bigger and more powerful than anything – any scientific theory, any one individual's will and sometimes even the rules of the universe. Love is more powerful than time itself."

Polins writes with a reverence for place and for people and a sense of a humility that are both rare and refreshing in young writers. She stops at various stations in narrative to deliver lines of homage and gratitude about her surroundings. For example, in describing the faculty of architecture building in Colombia, where Gabriella is studying, Polins writes: "Sunlight pours through the large pyramidal skylight that anchors the central atrium. The walls are hung with contemporary art and photographs of projects from alumni who have gone on to distinguished careers. It is an honour to have the chance to present in this space, as openness on all sides lends a sense of drama and importance to the occasion."

The very title itself, an extract from a poem by T. S. Eliot, is a clue to the reader that we will be traveling in a literary carriage into an intelligently written, challenging, provocative, unconventional dreamscape of human passion and existential mystery.

Polins was born and was raised in Montreal. Her roots are there, she told The CJN in a telephone conversation last week. She visits there still.

Much like the parental and grandparental characters of her novel, her parents provided strong examples of personal action and commitment. Her physician father, along with two other Canadian doctors, volunteered in 1973 to help treat Israeli army casualties during the Yom Kippur War. Her mother was instrumental in helping establish the renowned, activist Group of 35 on behalf of Soviet Jewry in the 1970s and '80s.

Wendy Dubow Polins

It was through her mother's work, on a clear day in 1974, that Polins met Israeli prime minister Golda Meir. "She looked like a grandmother, but she was a warrior. I will never forget what she told me," Polins said. "Your life should be about ideas and about changing things." These words and the theme they inspired find their way into Fare Forward.

After living for a while in Israel, Polins studied architecture in New York. She lives in the Boston area where she writes and teaches art history at Salem State University.

In words and ideas that echoed the large expansive style of her book, Polins told The CJN her motivation in writing Fare Forward. It "describes a journey. We are all voyagers. We are all on a journey. My quest [in the book] is to understand the point of life."

There were a number of factors, Polins explained, that came together at the same time that led her to put aside her work as an architect and pick up an author's pen.

As she accompanied her daughter to survey potential college campuses, Polins was reminded of that stage in our young lives "when we feel everything and anything was possible, when we find ourselves on the threshold of the new dawn."

She then decided "it was time to take a chance." The economy had slowed down in any event, and she saw a new opportunity to try to write the story that would combine her interests, curiosities and investigations, through Jewish study, into matters of the soul, and the distillate of a lecture she had heard at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology about Einstein, in which the lecturer claimed that Einstein had believed in the one-ness, the inter-connectedness of all life in the universe.

"What if," Polins speculated out loud, "Einstein had discovered something, had known something [about the unity of all physics and spirit] and held it back?"

And therein was planted in Polins' soaring imagination the seed of a story that has since germinated, to our reading pleasure, into Fare Forward.

As our conversation drew to a close, Polins again mentioned her meeting with Meir. "Golda told me I should find the things in life worth fighting for. And so, I've tried."

Fare Forward is the literary expression of that search and of the precious things that she found along the way that she suggests are worth fighting for.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Christians in Egypt, Iraq feel vulnerable, filmmaker says

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Christians in Egypt and Iraq are an endangered minority and are emigrating in droves, says Canadian journalist and broadcaster Martin Himel.

Himel, a freelance filmmaker and CTV's former correspondent in Israel, reached this sombre conclusion after paying visits to these countries recently.

His documentary, Persecuted Christians, will be broadcast by Vision TV in its world première on March 14 at 10 p.m.

In an interview, Himel said, "Most Iraqi Christians will tell you there is no future for Christians in Iraq."

Since the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, half of its Christians have fled. Some have gone to Iraq's northern Kurdish region, others have settled in neighbouring lands, while still others have left the Mideast.

In Egypt, where the Coptic Christian minority comprises 10 per cent of its population, Christians have emigrated en masse.

Christians in Egypt and Iraq have been subjected to bombings, murder and rape, said Himel, who is based in Israel.

He travelled to Cairo and Baghdad with Majed El Shafie, a Cairo-born Muslim who converted to Christianity and now lives in Canada. A human rights activist, he was tortured before leaving Egypt.

According to Himel, Copts in Egypt are gradually being driven out of high government and military positions and consider themselves second-class citizens. "We don't feel we have rights," says one Christian. "We feel persecution."

Egyptian Copts regard the rise of Islamic political parties since Hosni Mubarak's ouster last year as a threat to their existence. But a Muslim Brotherhood spokesman told Himel they have nothing to fear. Copts who intend to remain in post-Mubarak Egypt want the government to enact a bill of rights to guarantee their equality.

As Himel discovered, Christians in Iraq feel threatened and intimidated. On a visit to Our Lady of Deliverance Church in Baghdad, he glances at blood-spattered and pockmarked walls. In one of the bloodiest incidents since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime, the church was attacked by terrorists.

Himel, who described Iraq as a "very dangerous" destination where visitors require armed protection, accompanied El Shafie to meetings with two of Iraq's leading politicians.

Deputy Prime Minister Hussein al-Shahristani claims the church rejected an offer for protection. Vice-President Tariq el Hashimi maintains his Christian "brothers" are equal under the law.

Himel suggests that the treatment of Christians will be an acid test of Iraq's compatibility with democracy.

Filmmaker Martin Himel in Baghdad

For now, however, Iraqi Christians face "extinction" due to the ethnic chaos ravaging the country. With the United States out of the picture since the withdrawal of its troops and Iraqi Sunnis and Shiites struggling for power, Christians are caught in the middle and are vulnerable, Himel says.

By his estimate, 50 per cent of Iraq's 900,000 to one million Christians have already left, bound for various destinations, including Canada. In a brief appearance, Canadian Immigration Minister Jason Kenney says Canada has accepted more Iraqi refugees per capita than any other country.

Himel, who spent a week in Iraq, said that Iraq's Chaldean Catholics reminded him of Jews. "They pray in an Aramaic dialect that would be recognizable to any student of the Talmud. It's the same language Jews spoke at the time of the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem."

In Egypt, Christians are under siege, too.

"Under Mubarak, Christians had a benevolent second-class status. They could thrive in business and commerce, but the gateway to political power was closed. If they did not make political waves, life was good. If they questioned too much, prison and torture was a possibility."

Today, Egyptian Christians face a very uncertain future in what may become a theocratic state, he observed.

"The Muslim Brotherhood is trying to promote tolerance for Christians, but Salafists [radical Islamists] are far less tolerant. Christians fear more firebombings, attacks against their churches and rapes."

Syria is the next big question mark insofar as far as Christians are concerned. As Himel put it, "There are a couple of million Christians in Syria, and most have been loyal to President Bashar Assad's regime. But with Assad's imminent demise, Christians feel quite vulnerable."

Special to The CJN

Toronto writer Lilian Nattel's third novel, Web of Angels, signals a departure for the author of two previous works, both gems of historical fiction.

In The River Midnight (1999), a best-seller that earned worldwide raves, Nattel constructed the fictional Polish shtetl of Blaszka, complete with Chagall-like renderings of sages, peddlers, poets and the strong women who held it all together. The Singing Fire (2004), similarly richly detailed, is set in the Jewish ghetto of late Victorian London and relates the story of two very different Jewish immigrant women from Poland.

This time out, Nattel tries something quite different. For one, Web of Angels (Knopf Canada) is contemporary, set in an Annex-like Toronto neighbourhood (where Nattel still lives), and portrays a typically Canadian, multicultural family. It takes up a potentially tricky subject, but leavened with love and wisdom, the result is a daring, textured book that celebrates not just feminine strength but the human spirit.

"I was planning to write something completely different – another historical novel," the Montreal-born Nattel, 55, tells me in her living room, her small hands cradling a cup of hot tea. "And it just wasn't going anywhere. I needed to get back to writing. I started writing, and this is what came out." Nattel's heroine this time is not a Polish woman but a young Canadian mother of three. Sharon Lewis has a recognizably harried life of picking up kids from school, hurrying to and from programs and preparing meals. Her home is comfortably chaotic. All her husband and kids think is that Mom is a bit weird, but they love her for her quirks.

What sets Sharon apart is dissociative identity disorder (DID), a much misunderstood condition once called multiple personality disorder and always falsely labelled as split personality (which in turn, has been wrongly confused with schizophrenia).

Sharon, it soon becomes clear, has several "selves." Each is distinct and at least one is male. We never know who's going to show up.

This is no fly-by-night exploration of a little-known condition. Nattel "read everything I could get my hands on" and conducted in-depth interviews with some two-dozen people with DID. Neither is this the story of somebody she knows.

"It's distilled from the experiences of the people I got to know," she says. "Not a single one of those people feels that they can come out. Most of them are out with their spouses, children, therapists, and occasionally a sibling or best friend. But that's it. Because there's so much ignorance and misinformation about DID, people just don't feel they can [come out]."

As with her previous books, Nattel got an education on the subject.

"I came to realize that I hadn't recognized it because my own idea of DID was Sybil [the 1973 book about the treatment of Sybil Dorsett for multiple personality disorder]. That's most people's picture. And it's so far from the reality. As I absorbed that realization, I began to feel compelled to do something with all this knowledge that I had." Partly, Nattel seeks to dispel the stigma of DID. But Sharon's condition is a skeleton key. The novel opens on a shocking note meant to grab the reader by the lapels: Heather, a troubled, pregnant teenager and family friend, commits suicide (her baby is rescued by her mother, a doctor, in a none-too-gruesome way. The episode is based on a true event).

Not to give too much away, but the multiple personalities inside Sharon seem to know what happened to Heather and what may be happening to Heather's surviving sister (who is Sharon's son's girlfriend). Can Sharon rally herself and transcend pain and the taint of "mental illness" to rescue others?

It's not always an easy read and Nattel rarely takes the simple route. This is a vivid, warts-and-all portrayal of DID.

"There an argument that DID is not a mental illness," Nattel says. "It is listed in the DSM (the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders), but lots of things are listed in it that aren't mental illness." The condition, she explains, is an adaptation to trauma.

"You don't say your leg is sick when it breaks. It's more like an injury. You adapt to trauma in this way and then you grow with it. A mental illness implies a lack of functionality, something to be cured of." Those with the condition can have completely normal lives, she says. "DID has enabled them to compartmentalize the terrible things they've endured in order to function."

The goal is not necessarily a cure, but "to live co-operatively. It's about living peacefully and collectively in the present without holding on to the pain of the past."

And everyone can relate to Sharon, believes Nattel, herself a survivor of sexual abuse.

"I've never met a person who has gone through life unscathed. We all have pain."

Nattel never divulges how many personalities Sharon has. Among those with DID, revealing or asking that question is considered rude, she says. So is inquiring about personalities' names. "The point is to function, not to be seen as different."

Nattel says writing the book, which took eight years including research, was cathartic. Her character's ability "to use the pain of her experience to save two children is cathartic." Sensing she's about to issue a spoiler, Nattel promises the book's resolution "is extremely satisfying in every way."

> This is a vivid, warts-and-all portrayal of DID

She concedes the book was a challenge.

"It's challenging to present an authentic picture that is also comprehensible to the reader. My background in historical fiction helped me with that because that's also a very foreign world. And this is the same thing. I'm building a world."

Big defenceman recruited by NCAA D1 school

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you check NHL Central Scouting's current list of the best North American draft prospects, you've got to scroll down – way down – before you'll come across Ori Abramson's name.

There, listed in 210th place, is the six-foot-three, 215-pound defenceman.

Although his positioning suggests he'd be a late-round pick, it wasn't that long ago that Abramson wouldn't have made the list at all. Although plenty big, the knock on him was that he didn't skate very well.

"I was always big and strong, but I never had the foot speed or confidence other kids had," the 18-year-old acknowledged.

With a burning ambition to advance his game, Abramson decided to do something about it. "I found a Russian skating instructor, and he lengthened my stride," he explained.

For two years, five or six times a week, two hours at a time, Abramson hit the ice "working purely on skating."

The results are there in the Central Scouting list. It's also been apparent on the ice. The improved skating helped the Toronto teen develop with the Bay City Breakers, a Kingston, Mass., team that plays in the Eastern Junior Hockey League.

Division 1 NCAA teams also took note of the big kid who could skate. Several college teams pursued him, and not long ago, the Breakers announced he'd come to terms with the Providence College Friars, a Hockey East team that boasts some big name hockey people among its alumni, including Lou Lamoriello, Brian Burke, Ron Wilson and Hal Gill.

Despite offers from other New England NCAA schools, he felt he would best fit in with the Friars' rebuilding program, headed by coach Nate Leaman.

"I have been impressed with the success he brought in his previous head coaching job, and I know that he will enjoy the same success with Providence and its great hockey history and tradition. I look forward to the opportunity to learn from him and to play in Hockey East," Abramson said in a statement.

His American opportunity is something he's been striving toward, but it was far from a sure thing, especially when his skating was still a drawback.

Ori Abramson

"It started at 14 or 15 when I knew I had to do something about my foot speed, because I couldn't keep up in AAA," he said.

Abramson played a couple of seasons with the Brampton Capitals in the tier II Ontario Junior Hockey League (OJHL), a springboard for players eyeing the NCAA. As his skating improved, he got a look from the OHL St. Mike's Majors, who drafted him as a 16-year-old. He attended their camp, but going in, he knew he'd only last two days. He'd already set his sights set on the NCAA, and he'd be ineligible if he spent a third day with the OHL team.

Nevertheless, the experience was eye-opening: "I saw how fast the game is at the next level," he said.

Back in the OJHL, he was pretty successful. He was nominated for rookie of the year as one of only 10 16-year-olds in the league.

In the meantime, he continued to work on his skating, focusing on "explosiveness" in the first three steps.

Under the mentorship of Vince Laise, an assistant coach with the Oakville Blades, whom he trained with at the Varsity Hockey gym in Brampton, he began to look to Hockey East as a preferred destination for his post-junior development.

He agreed to play for the Breakers, figuring it would give him greater exposure to New England Division 1 schools. "It was an adventure," his father, Lanning, said. "He wanted to move away from home and live in a house with hockey players."

By the time he got to Bay State, "I was one of the fastest guys on the ice," Abramson said. Unfortunately, his season was marred by a hip injury suffered when he was checked through an open door at practice.

There was another setback due to a bout of mononucleosis, which sent him home until his health improved.

Still, his coach at Bay State liked what he saw. David McCauley said Abramson adapted well to a new league and new style of play. "Before he got injured, he was really starting to come along. He was learning the defensive side of things. I think his positional play got better, which allowed him to be more effective. He made a good first pass and was able to join the rush."

Abramson's strong work ethic also was evident. "He's a great kid, really works his tail off," McCauley said. "I think the kid's got a great future because of his work ethic."

His dad has seen the hours of dry-land and on-ice training pay off nicely.

"His story is that he wasn't a blue chip kid from the age of six. Ori didn't become the best kid on the ice until he was 17, but he worked his ass off to get there," Lanning said. "The more people told him he couldn't, the harder he worked."

Hockey tournament to support autism awareness

Compiled by CJN staff

The second annual Joel Schwartz Memorial Hockey Tournament (JSMHT) will take place Sunday, March 11, at Chesswood Arena.

Presented by RioCan, the tournament will see 16 teams and their supporters come together to raise awareness about autism and help beat last year's fundraising total of more than $100,000.

Joel Schwartz was born with autism and was a client of Reena. He died March 3, 2009, two months after participating in a Birthright Israel trip with support from a Reena shadow. Proceeds from the tournament will go to the Joel Schwartz Endowment Fund at the Reena Foundation created to help young adults born with developmental disabilities.

JSMHT founders Zack Belzberg, 24, Jesse Abrams, 24, and Joel's younger brother, Jonathan Schwartz, 24, came up with the idea to host a hockey tournament in Joel's honour while on a subway ride to work.

"Joel loved to watch his brother's hockey games, and would be so happy to see his friends and hundreds of others come together in his honour," Belzberg said.

"Joel was a loving and kind person who had a profound impact on so many people," Abrams added.

The JSMHT is a full day round-robin event. The finals will run from 6 p.m. to – 9 p.m. and everyone is invited to attend.

Multimedia concert to feature music from video game

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Music from Final Fantasy, a popular role-playing video game series, will be performed in a multimedia concert to be presented in Toronto at the Sony Centre for the Performing Arts.

The March 31 concert, Distant Worlds: Music from Final Fantasy, features award-winning music from the record-breaking Japanese video game series.

Chicago-based Grammy Award-winner Arnold (Arnie) Roth will conduct the 71-member Kitchener-Waterloo Symphony and the 40-voice Tallis Choir of Toronto. Three local operatic soloists will also perform.

Unique to the Toronto concert is the appearance of Nobuo Uematsu, who composed much of the music for the Final Fantasy series.

Roth says that Uematsu is to video music what Hollywood composer John Williams is to film scores and feels very fortunate that Uematsu will join him on stage in Toronto.

"The most exciting thing is the new arrangement that I wrote that is entitled Final Fantasy VI: Dark World," Roth says. "We wanted to create a piece, so that the renowned composer would be able to play something live on stage with us.

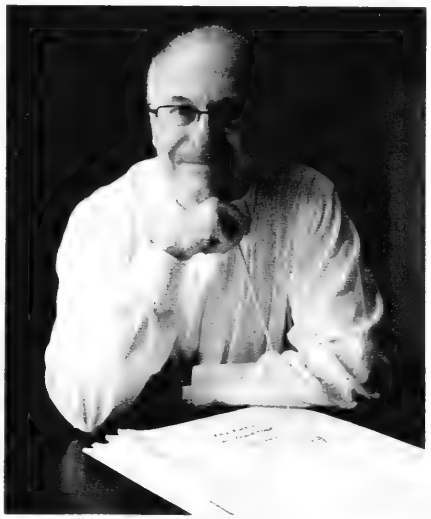
"He's a keyboard/piano player. He has agreed to play organ, and I will play the violin. So, the two of us will play the two solo positions with the orchestra on this piece, and we will be playing it in Toronto for the first time."

Roth says gamers and non-gamers alike will enjoy the Sony Centre concert. "If they are video-game fans, it needs little explanation of what this tour is. We have been touring around the world with this specific tour, Distant Worlds, now into our sixth year.

"Concert programs of the music of Final Fantasy have become legendary. If you are a fan of any video game, you will know some of the most famous titles of music and scenes from Final Fantasy. For instance, the song One Winged Angel is the single most popular piece of music in all of video games," he says.

"Video gamers are going to know that they are going to hear the most famous classic scores from the past 25 years of Final Fantasy on the stage at the Sony Centre."

Roth says those who haven't played the game will also enjoy the show. "If you are not into video games, this is about as legendary and the highest level of introduction as one could get. What you are going to be experiencing is what I would call very cinematic music scores.



Arnold Roth

"In that way, if you think of some of the most moving, emotional and heroic scores coming from movies, this is squarely in that same writing style and category.

"And, just the sheer size, with well over 100 performers on stage – it is an epic, massive production on every corner of that big stage at the Sony Centre," Roth adds.

A high-definition video screen will project characters and scenes from the video game above the musicians.

Over the last 25 years, the Final Fantasy franchise has sold more than 110 million copies, becoming the most recognized role-playing game in the world. The story continues to evolve, with unique characters, compelling storylines and engaging game play, driving the series into numerous sequels, live productions and films.

Final Fantasy video

Besides his mega Final Fantasy tours worldwide, Roth has performed with numerous orchestras around the world and is the principal conductor and music director of the Chicagoland Pops Orchestra. He is also a member of Mannheim Steamroller, an orchestra known for modernizing Christmas music. Roth won the best score award at the 2003 DVD Premier Awards for his soundtrack to the film Barbie as Rapunzel. The married father of three and grandfather of three now works with his grown son, Eric, who is also a conductor.

Tickets for Distant Worlds: Music from Final Fantasy can be purchased at the Sony Centre box office, by phone at 1-855-872-7669 or online at www.sonycentre.ca.

Two Fans chase down childhood sports heroes

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

For sports mega-fans Ethan Cole and Laurence Mandel Payne, it's never too late to pursue childhood dreams – even if they're completely ridiculous.

The 28-year-old Jewish Torontonians write and co-host a television series called The Project, where they attempt to track down their athletic heroes.

In their documentary-style shorts, Cole and Payne cross items off their sports fans' bucktet lists by chasing down their childhood sports heroes and setting them up in iconic – if not awkward – situations. Their 22-minute episodes are later edited and aired on The Score, the national sports television channel.

"So much sports content has a top-down, heavy-handed feel to it," says Payne.

"We wanted to put the power back into the hands of fans, so we created a show where two fans do crazy things that only other sports fans would want to do."

In one of their first episodes, the pair chased down arch-rivals Ben Johnson and Carl Lewis to meet for the first time in 20 years. Their goal was to get the pair to re-enact the 100-metre dash from the 1988 Summer Olympics in Seoul, South Korea, back when the filmmakers were just five years old.

"We knew roughly where Carl Lewis was, because he was running for state senate at the time. When we got to New Jersey, we asked everyone in the area if they knew where to find him," Cole says. "Then a guy at a 7/11 told us where he got coffee every morning, so we decided to wait for him there."

Cole and Payne got Johnson in the car and waited for Lewis in the parking lot until the two could be brought together. "Sometimes you can't write the stuff. You just have to take what's given," Cole says.

As the episode unfolded, the pair bonded with one of their longtime heroes.

"Ben called us idiots all the time, but in a fun way," recalls Payne. "We really became friends, and we hope to work with him again."

In another episode, the two chased around retired pro-wrestler The Ultimate Warrior, born James Brian Hellwig, in search of life advice.

"He told us to always follow our own compass, which was pretty interesting and inspiring," recalls Payne. "He also told us to get up really early in the morning, when there are fewer people competing for the world's energy."

But the most memorable moment for Cole was when the pair got Otis Nixon to re-enact a key moment from the 1992 World Series with them.

One snowy afternoon in Atlanta, Nixon re-enacted the worst memory of his career – the bunt that ended the World Series.

"Otis also taught us how to bunt and throw properly, and no one else had ever really taught us that," says Payne. "It was really nice to get actual baseball tips from a pro like that."

Of course, shooting a live, reality-style show is not without its challenges. Cole and Payne write, produce, and host the series but often have trouble predicting where their journeys will take them.

"You don't have much control over certain things," says Cole. "We're trying to create 22 minutes of interesting content for every episode, but when we're in the field, trying to track down athletes, we don't know what will happen. We have to take what we can get."

The key, says Payne, is to figure out how to make people laugh while keeping multiple backup plans in mind.

And in a sense, the creation of the show itself came as an unexpected event. Originally, Payne and Cole collaborated on a documentary about heavyweight boxing champion Buster Douglas.

"We showed a trailer of our film to people at The Score, and it was when we were all in that room together that we realized a more interesting idea would be to work off our bucket lists in a show where people could watch us as we attempt improbable things."

Cole and Payne, who met as students at the University of Western Ontario, were more than happy to join forces and pursue something radically different from their day jobs.

Payne had worked extensively in entertainment licensing at a web startup. He specialized in aggregating online content and worked in advertising production.

Cole was also in the advertising world, after obtaining a master's degree in international relations at Cambridge University. But Cole's passion for film and storytelling led him to The Score.

"We're basically two working guys with a crazy side project," Payne says.

"If we never just took the risk of making that first documentary, even though we had no budget, then none of the rest would have happened."

"You can't wait around for someone to find you, you have to figure out a way to get that first step done and hope someone likes it," Payne says.

For upcoming episodes, the two lifelong sports fans hope to become former NBA star Charles Barkley's personal assistants, pick up girls with tennis pro Boris Becker and submit baseball's Jose Canseco to a lie-detector test.

They're also looking for suggestions from viewers and other sports fans. To contribute show ideas or watch clips of their new series, visit www.thisistheproject.com.

A visit with Granny

"Do you wanna drop by?" Alison, my new posh friend, asks me over the phone.

I'm very flattered. It's not every day you're invited to visit a rich, beautiful celebrity (she was on TV!) like Alison.

"I'll be honoured," I say immediately. Guess I'm not so hard to get.

I arrive in a festive mood.

"I'll only be gone for 20 minutes," Alison promises, blowing me a light kiss. "Two hours at the latest. Don't let her play with the recycle bin. She gets too excited. Ta-ta!" And she's gone.

I enter the house feeling defeated, to find Alison's Granny. I sit down in front of her. We're silent. I like old people. I mean, you can just sit and listen to their nostalgic stories for ever. Or at least for 20 minutes, as promised.

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

"Hi, Granny! Would you like me to get you some tea?" I ask loudly.

Granny gazes at me angrily. "You're sitting on Katharina's seat," she says severely.

I jump up.

"Do you remember Katharina?" she asks. As I delay my reply, she continues, "She loved you very, very much, my Katharina. Even after all these years, I talk to her in my sleep, and she says you were her favourite!"

I nod humbly. "She was a dear, uh, woman," I say.

Granny looks at me suspiciously. "Woman?" she asks, her left eye blinking in a scary way. "She was my cat!" Granny shouts at me. "Try to focus here, Hester! Don't you remember my Katharina, Hester?"

I wish I remembered Katharina, I wish I were Hester, I wish everything.

"I have some metal bones," Granny announces proudly all of a sudden. "Remember? From the accident?"

I nod.

"Metal bones. I'm Steve Austin!" she says.

Another pause.

"How is your brother these days?" Granny asks. "Um… he's great, thanks," I reply nervously.

"It's a good thing you're a lawyer, Hester, now that he's in jail!"

I see the matter is very important to her, because she's shouting. "What do you call 500 lawyers at the bottom of the sea?" she asks me sternly, and gives me the answer: "A good start!" she hollers.

I wish I was a lawyer, I wish I had a brother, I wish…

Exactly three hours later, Alison enters the house in a good mood. "Hi Granny!" She kisses her warmly (how come I only get air kisses?) "Did you have fun with… (she looks at me, as I whisper, "Hester") Hester?"

Granny's not sure. "Actually, she was trying to kill me," she finally says.

Alison and I are on our way to the door. "Sorry, she's in that phase." She smiles her superstar smile. I melt instantly.

"It'll get better," I promise her.

"It is better. At least she's dressed! I'll call you next week. Maybe we'll do something together!"

I nod happily. I have a celebrity friend!

Purim: God, neighbour and self

Megillat Esther tells the Jewish People to keep the days of Purim "as days of feasting and gladness, and sending portions of food to one another and gifts to the poor." It is the responsibility of all Jews to give two portions of food to a family member or friend (mishloach manot), and two bits of tzedakah to two poor people (matanot le'evyonim).

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

These two mitzvot do not start and stop with the self, but instead require interaction between us and others. The Torah refers to such a mitzvah as ben adam l'chavero – between a person and his friend.

There is another category of mitzvah in the Torah, however, called ben adam l'Makom, between a person and God, such as learning Torah.

But shouldn't there be a third? What about the mitzvot we do to strengthen our souls, such as lashon naki, speaking clean language? Shouldn't such a category exist? We'll call it ben adam l'atzmo – a mitzvah between a person and himself.

An answer to this question might emanate from the idea that it is our task to make our existence God-centric, one that requires some negation of the self.

In the Tower of Babel story, we find the sin of those who built the tower was their self-centredness and attempt to remove God from the picture. "Come, let us build ourselves a city, and a tower with its top in the heavens, and let us make a name for ourselves" (Genesis 11:4). Because the people of Shinar were motivated by their desire to increase their own reputation, not by the Divine nature of reality, they were punished. From this we see that there is no reason for mitzvot between a person and himself. While speaking "clean language" reflects well on an individual, the real reason we are commanded to communicate in such a way is so that we can "see ourselves in the image of God."

Another school within Judaism states the opposite – that indeed God created the world for each one of us. Every person is commanded to be happy and to rest on Shabbat. We are told to give tzedakah, but not too much so that we do not ourselves become poor. It would seem from this – a recognition of individual needs – that a category of mitvot ben adam l'atzmo makes sense.

Perhaps the answer lies in the middle. The Jewish People are commanded to accept the Divine spirit as fundamental to their lives – hence the mitzvot ben adam l'Makom. In order to achieve this, however, Jews must also work within their world, to love our neighbour like ourselves, a condition of humanity thought to be more important than any other precept in the Torah: hence ben adam l'chavero.

The conduit to achieving these two goals is in fact the self, for how can I love my neighbour if I do not first love myself? So, while a third category of ben adam l'atzmo is in fact discussed, it appears to be secondary to the two others so that we do not get lost in ourselves and forget God and the importance of community. (Interestingly, while it is prohibited to put ourselves at the centre of existence, it appears God did just that.)

Mishloach manot and matanot le'evyonim are mitzvot that require the self to actualize but cannot start or stop with the need to do good. They must extend far beyond into a Godly place where we are commanded to love our neighbours like ourselves. Happy Purim.

The Canadian Jewish news

Section B

We salute educators...

Two years ago in this supplement, a popular article featured educators recalling the teachers who had a lasting impact on them.

This year, we revisit the same theme, with input from half a dozen people whose careers are a bit unconventional. They recall teachers who were sometimes unconventional too, and whose influence, for the most part, had little to do with academics.

In the same vein, Ilanna Sharon Mandel shares memories of her father, Edward Yuditsky, who died in December. Mr. Yuditsky, as I think of him, led the junior congregation at my shul for 13 years until he retired at age 85 after a long career as a Jewish educator.

Contributor Marcy White reflects on the experience of her nine-year-old son, who has special needs, as he was being integrated into a mainstream public school class last year. She credits a receptive school principal and an "energetic, motivated and loving" teacher – as well as warm and accepting students – for making it work.

We also consider some of the other factors that come into play in education, particularly Jewish education. The former director of Toronto's Mercaz (formerly the Board of Jewish Education), Seymour (Epi) Epstein, advocates for the importance of a central Jewish education agency, and we look at the impact of high Jewish day school tuition, a perennial issue in our community.

Chag Purim Samayach.

To learn poetry, or not to learn poetry

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Iambic pentameter. Alliteration. Haiku. Rhythm and rhyme. Shakespeare. Lord Byron. Yehuda Amichai.

Feeling poetic yet?

The art of the poem is something that can sometimes get lost or take a back seat to the myriad of other subjects being taught in the Jewish community's day school system.

Students in the parochial system today are faced with a course load that is not only laden with religious and Hebrew instruction, but also with the secular curricula mandated by government.

All of this can leave little room for learning to read and write poetry.

But is it a necessary subject? Most educators believe so.

Paul Shaviv, director of education at TanenbaumCHAT, believes poetry is still a vital element.

"Naturally, poetry and the appreciation and understanding of poetry is an integral part of the high school English curriculum, which is a compulsory subject throughout all four years of high school. At a fundamental level, every student is involved with reading and writing poetry," Shaviv said.

He added that poetry appears in many other subjects in his school. For instance, in their Hebrew studies, students study modern Hebrew poetry and they may also encounter poetry from other eras in Jewish history.

When students study Tanach, they encounter "many poetic passages, both embedded in the narrative text and, for example the Psalms," Shaviv said. "No literate person in either Hebrew, English or any other language should be deaf to the voice of the poet."

Shaviv said that in his school, the form of poetry instruction may vary depending on the teacher. Some ask students to memorize poems, others may not.

However, there are some who feel poetry instruction leaves a little to be desired in the school system.

Baila Ellenbogen, a poet and psychoeducational consultant with the TDSB, thinks today's students might be learning poetry more by rote and with less creative emphasis than the subject deserves.

"I think that poetry composition should be taught differently than poetry reading because it involves more than using [or] recognizing poetic literary devices, but an engagement with associative, creative thinking, and recursive, discovery-oriented editing processes," she told The CJN recently.

While she doesn't have in-depth knowledge of how poetry is taught in the Jewish day school system, Ellenbogen echoed Shaviv's sentiment about studying Jewish texts with an eye toward poetry.

"Some religious texts like Tehillim [Psalms] might be explored using poetry reading and writing lessons... that might be an interesting project," she said.

Over at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Benjamin Cohen, principal of general studies, said his students follow the same curriculum guidelines as all other day schools in the province. This includes instruction in poetry.

Children will learn some basics of form and rhyme in the earlier grades, he said, and as they progress through to grades seven and eight, will sometimes be given the option to produce a poem as part of an assignment.

"At age-appropriate levels, they learn about different kinds of poetry, formats of poems. In early grades they might learn about an acrostic poem, a limerick or a quatrain," Cohen said. "As [students] get older they learn about other literary devices like metaphor and figurative language. And eventually they do some creative writing themselves."

He said students don't generally memorize poetry anymore.

"The generation of my parents did a lot of [memorizing]... but we don't do much of that. Students might have to recite a few lines of a Shakespeare sonnet, and then only in grades Seven and Eight."

Schools experiment with interactive technologies

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

If you can't beat 'em, join 'em.

That seems to be the philosophy most Toronto Jewish day schools are adopting as mobile electronic devices are quickly replacing paper and pens, and changing the way students get information and interact with their teachers.

In May, the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) voted to reverse a four-year-old ban on cellphones during school in order to foster "21st-century learning."

Former trustee (and current city councilor) Josh Matlow, who brought forward the policy in 2007, criticized the decision to reverse the ban.

"[Cellphones] are a distraction when you should be learning. The Internet component can be used for cheating. The camera and video components of many of the smartphones were used incredibly inappropriately, often for bullying," Matlow told the Toronto Star.

Leo Baeck Day School math and science teacher Ilana Cyna suspects the decision reflects the fact that public schools "may not have the access to technology that we have, so they're allowing students to use the cellphone, hopefully, in a constructive purpose so that they have access to the Internet and calculators."

Cyna said that at her school, many students in the older grades bring their own laptops to class.

"Not only do students bring in their own laptops, we have a laptop cart that we bring into the classrooms. We also have an iPad cart," Cyna said, adding that the school has about 20 of the tablets, enough for one classroom at a time.

But when it comes to cellphones, Leo Baeck doesn't allow mobile devices to be used throughout the day, "unless there is a specific activity that is very controlled... We think [cellphones] are more of a distraction at this point," Cyna said.

Frank Samuels, principal of Yeshivat Or Chaim, said he's skeptical that the real reason the TDSB lifted its four-year ban on cellphones in schools is that they wanted to foster "21st-century learning."

"I just think they gave up... it's a convenient PR spin on saying that they didn't know how to deal with it anymore."

Leo Baeck Day School Grade 4 students work on a social studies unit in their school's computer lab. From front to back are Noa Tulchinsky, Noah Lubov, Sabrina Sefton, Jayme Burke, Adam Friedman and Romy Weltman.

Samuels said his school's policy dictates that "the cellphone should not be used in any way that is disruptive. Not as a watch, not as a calculator, not as an organizer, not as an automatic defibrillator in case you have a heart attack."

However Samuels said some students will use the camera on their phones to snap an image of a homework assignment posted on the Smart Board – an interactive white board that connects to a computer and projector – rather than jotting it down the old-fashioned way.

Despite the school's policy against cellphones in class, Samuels said his school is tech-friendly, with a strong wireless connection and a netbook for each of the teachers.

Students at Associated tweet feedback onto Smart Boards

A number of teachers, he added, send homework assignments directly to their students' e-mail inboxes.

Samuels said he wouldn't be opposed to teachers allowing their students to access Internet search engines such as Google during class for research purposes, but said it presents an issue for students who may not have access to a laptop or a smartphone.

"I don't want it to be that because you own an iPad that you are at an educational advantage."

But Samuels, who has his own Facebook and Twitter accounts, embraces new technology and encourages his students to stay current.

Last year, Samuels planned a "tweetfest" around the subject of Yom Yerushalayim and encouraged his students to tweet their thoughts about the holiday.

He said he hopes the development of new technologies will have a positive influence on the delivery of education.

"I think if you were to take an 18th century child... and put that student in today's classroom, too much of the room looks the same. One adult at the front, the desks, there is a board, et cetera. I think technology will force us to break that mould," he said.

Most Jewish day schools in Toronto are adapting to the new trends.

Robbins Hebrew Academy head of school Claire Sumerlus, said her school enjoys wireless service and has a laptop cart for her students. But she's interested in taking things further by incorporating cellphones and other mobile devices into lesson plans.

"It would be really interesting if students could tweet to their teachers. While the teacher is lecturing or teaching something, the kids could tweet their questions in and it could come up right away on the Smart Board. It's really a 21st-century way of doing things."

From left, Alexa Charlat, Josh Gertin, Jessica Weinberg and Lauren Backstein, Grade 4 students at Robbins Hebrew Academy, Beth Tzedec campus, use an online website called Popplet to learn about habitats.

Brenda Dzaldov, principal of Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School, said her Grade 8 students are already putting Sumerlus' idea into practice.

"While the teacher is teaching on the Smart Board, they can tweet feedback and comments right onto the Smart Board," she said.

"That increases participation, it increases accountability and the students are way more engaged in the process, rather than having a kid with his hand up that the teacher can't get to."

While Cyna said she would worry about the distraction that cellphones in class presents, Dzaldov said students who don't want to pay attention will find ways to tune out, whether they have a cellphone or not.

"In the same way that a kid could be sitting in the class writing a note to a friend and not paying attention to the lesson, or staring out at the wall instead of focusing – we encourage the kids to be focused at all times and the teacher does monitor it. Is it a perfect system? Probably not. There's no such thing at any school."

The school policy says students can only use their phones before school, during lunch break, after school, or in class if it's part of the lesson.

Dzaldov, who recently obtained her PhD in literacy and technology education, and co-authored a book on literacy and interactive technology, said Associated students are required to sign contracts that outline the policies and procedures related to using mobile devices in class.

In addition to using cellphones, Dzaldov said that Grade 8 literacy classes could also use laptops to write an exam.

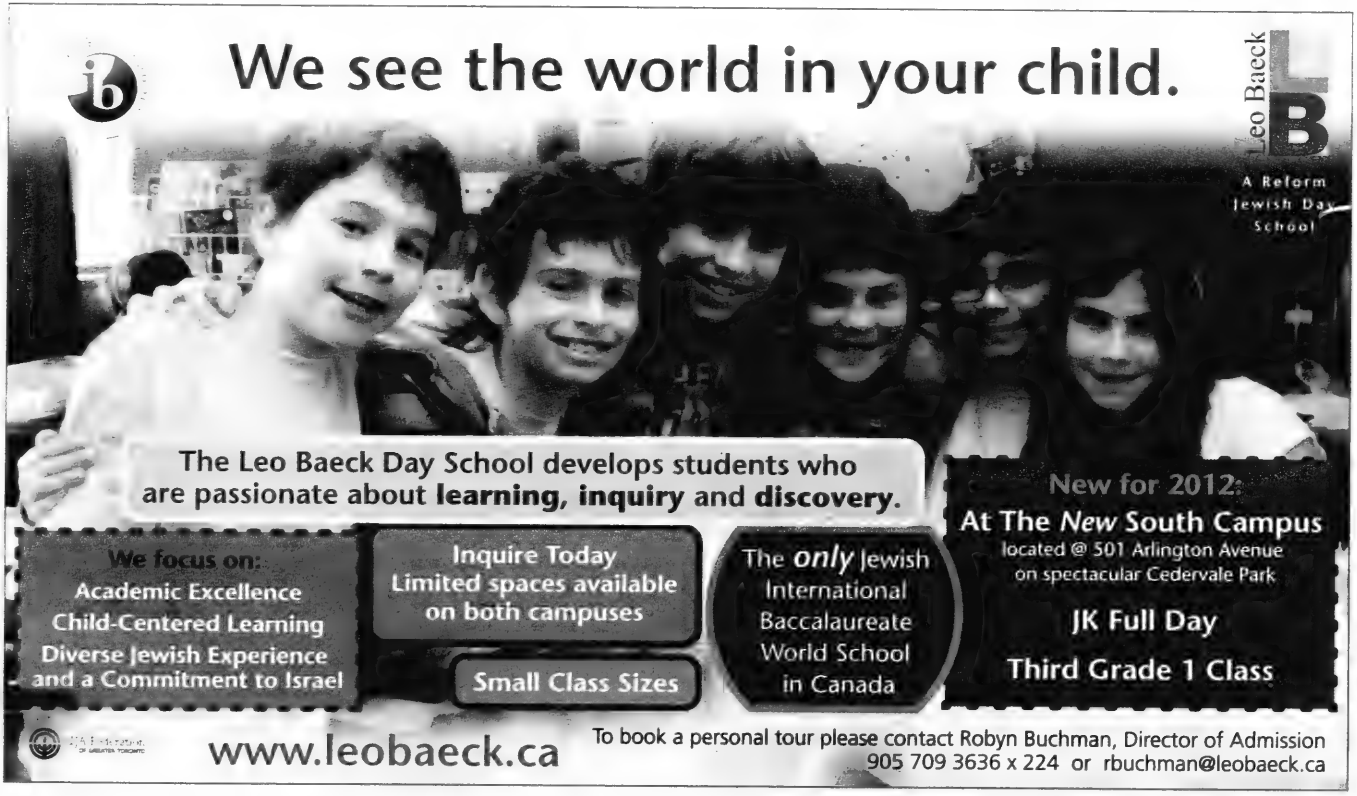
"The kids had the option of using paper and pencil or at a certain moment, the exam was e-mailed to them... They opened it up, opened a Word document, had the instructions on the computer and at the end of the exam, it was time stamped and they e-mailed it back to the teacher."

Sumerlus said that while introducing technology into schools is necessary, teaching cyber safety is the first step.

"It would be great to see all the schools collaborate and come up with something really wonderful that would be a part of the kids' education," she said.

Dzaldov agreed, saying that while it's important to stay current, safety is a priority.

"We're moving as fast as the world is moving because we don't want to fall behind, but we want to do it in a safe environment."



We see the world in your child.

A good teacher can sometimes change your life

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Earlier this year, the New York Times reported on a recent study by three American economics professors that showed the positive impact of some elementary and middle-school teachers on students' lives in later years.

According to the study, teachers who helped raise students' standardized test scores also seemed to have had other long-term beneficial influences, manifested in lower teen pregnancy rates, higher rates of college matriculation and greater adult earnings.

"Looking only at test scores, previous studies had shown, the effect of a good teacher mostly fades after three or four years. But the broader view showed that the students still benefit for years to come," the paper reported.

For this article, we thought it would be interesting to talk to people here who've followed unusual career paths, and hear about teachers who had a long-lasting impact on them.

Ian Leventhal

Ian Leventhal, artist and executive director of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada's Toronto office, recalls that Joan Pemberton, his "extremely unique" high school art teacher at Bathurst Heights Secondary School created a "hands-on, nurturing and stimulating environment" for her students in the "prim and proper" late 1960s.

A believer in getting her students out of the classroom, she allowed them "to see different possibilities," Leventhal told The CJN.

A fine arts graduate of York University, Leventhal also studied at the Ontario College of Art (now OCAD) and in France. The prolific artist, now 60, is known for his exuberant work in Israel and Canada, including award-winning designs for Second Cup. As well, he spearheaded an exhibition of Jewish and Chinese artists in Shanghai.

"Miss Pemberton took us to her home, to museums, [to places that were] art-related but special – wherever you were going to find that creative spark. It didn't have to be in the classroom.

"We always thought she was a little bit off the wall, and that's why we loved her so much… There was a warmth. We were her little brood of chickens, and she was our mother hen.

"She gave us that sky's-the-limit, it's all out there, go-for-it attitude."

Robin Mednick

Robin Mednick, founder and president of Pencils for Kids, a grassroots charitable organization that helps children in Niger, credits Gladys Shibley Mitchell, who taught her public speaking, elocution and drama for many years, for bringing out the best in her students.

Mednick – who has a master's degree in politics and economics from Oxford University and a law degree from Osgoode Hall – also obtained her associate teacher's diploma in speech and drama from Trinity College in London, England.

In 1967, Mednick, then 14, began taking lessons at Shibley Mitchell's studio; her teacher was 75 at the time. They stayed in touch until Mitchell's death in 1984.

"She managed to reach out to you as a person. She encouraged you, inspired you, and made sure your mission in life was to fulfil your potential.

"I often ask myself, 'Would she be proud?' She was the measurement for me."

Ellie Tesher

Ellie Tesher, syndicated advice columnist, says that the teacher who had the most impact on her was her father, Philip Goldman, even though he was a pharmacist, not a teacher.

Tesher, who started her career life as a social worker before becoming an award-winning journalist and writing a 1999 best-seller on the Dionne quintuplets, said that words were very important to her father, and that he had a wonderful sense of humour.

"For his leisure reading, he would read Encyclopaedia Britannica and the dictionary, and he made words very important. He would correct a word, without being a strict disciplinarian. He would show you the meaning and the etymology. He was very interested in language. That was a huge influence.

"[Also], when he had his little drugstore on Harbord Street, I used to sit on the rack of comic books and listen to people as they came in, and many came in just for advice."

'It's not so much what they're teaching'

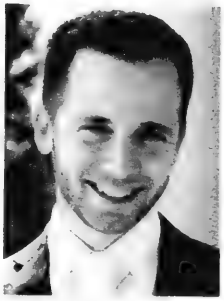
Mitchell Marcus, founder and artistic producer of Acting Up Stage Company, says that a few teachers had an impact on his career. He started acting professionally at age 16.

Sherri Helwig, who is now on the University of Toronto faculty, taught Marcus' arts administration course at York University. Marcus, who graduated from York in 2004, credits Helwig for recognizing and fostering his passion for the arts. The vision he had for his company grew out of a business plan he wrote for the first project he did in her class.

Earlier, at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, English teacher Louise Novis not only taught Marcus how to write, but believed in him, he said.



Mitchell Marcus

And drama teacher Lori Cohen (now Fahidi) gave him the opportunity to direct a show, and supported him in his successful petition to have an OAC drama class added to the school curriculum.

"For me, the teachers who left the biggest impact didn't necessarily do so through curriculum, but through a real sense of care and support.

"In a non-traditional and perhaps 'risky' career, it was the teachers who showed a strong belief in me and really went beyond the call of duty as cheerleaders for me who stand out as having really made the difference."

Alisse Lee Goldenberg

Alisse Lee Goldenberg just published her first book, The Strings of the Violin, a young adult fantasy novel.

The mother of one-year-old triplets with a bachelor of fine arts degree from York University and a bachelor of education from d'Youville College in Buffalo, Lee Goldenberg said she always wanted to be an author, and that Amy Body, her Grade 6 and 8 English teacher at Leo Baeck Day School in the mid-1990s encouraged her to keep writing.

"We had all these creative writing assignments… She just made writing and reading so much fun for everybody that it really fostered a love for it.

"She encouraged the entire class. She never really singled anyone out. She gave us advice along the way, and almost treated us like her kids. She encouraged us to talk [things] out."

Michael Wolfson, senior advisor, food and beverage sector, for the City of Toronto, said his math teacher at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, David Simonoff, influenced his career path, but not through anything that had to do with teaching math.

Simonoff had a friend who was a maître d' at the now-defunct Westbury Hotel. At the time, Tony Roldan was the hotel's head chef, and Simonoff arranged for Roldan to speak at Mackenzie's career day.

Michael Wolfson

Wolfson, who went on to study food and beverage administration at George Brown College, recalls being impressed with Roldan's presentation, and with his entourage of several people.

After more than 30 years in the food industry, Wolfson – who graduated from Mackenzie in 1971 and later earned his bachelor's degree in economics at York University – recalls that the career he ended up with wasn't on his radar screen until Roldan's presentation.

"I was lousy in math. It was Mr. Simonoff's outside interest [that made a difference for me.] He had a real interest and passion for the food industry… He was a foodie, a nice guy, and an interesting guy to speak to.

"Most teachers have influence over students in a way that doesn't fall into their subject matter… it's not so much what they're teaching them [that matters], it's their interest in them as a real person."

Writing project brings schools together

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Two Toronto schools are teaming up to write children's books together – and craft memories that will last a lifetime.

For Grade 2 students at the Toronto Heschel School, the arrival of Grade 12 Writer's Craft students from Ulpanat Orot (Ulpana) has quickly become a highlight of the school week. One girl even insisted that her family had to come back early from vacation because she didn't want to miss a visit.

The project, in its second year, was conceived by Frank Samuels, principal of Bnei Akiva Schools, which operates both Ulpana and Yeshivat Or Chaim.

Samuels stepped in to teach the optional Writer's Craft course in his early years at Ulpana when the teacher, Brenda Freedman, sister of York University professor Marty Lockshin, became ill. He hoped to hold the position for her until she could return, but she died not long afterward. That was 2006, and he's been teaching the course ever since.

"The whole [Writer's Craft] year is dedicated to showing the students how to become better writers and better readers," says Samuels. He hoped the collaborative writing project, as a part of that course, would create "real-life learning," offering the girls "not just an assignment," but the opportunity to "meet another person, writing for and with that person."

This year, there are eight Ulpana students to 21 Heschel students, so groups of younger kids work with each girl from Ulpana. At the end of the project, each student receives one copy of the story they've worked on, and all the stories are bound together into an archive – one for Heschel and one for Ulpana.

Words and pictures come together: Jack draws while Rebecca writes.

Last year's pilot run "worked way beyond my wildest dreams," Samuels says.

Teachers at Heschel agree. "From our end, it's been really an amazing project," says Malka Regan, an elementary division head who's been at Heschel for 15 years.

"We try to have our students connect with all kinds of different people."

Collaboration with public schools and other Jewish schools is part of Heschel's lifelong learning approach. "We feel very strongly about community as a whole and being part of a greater Jewish community."

For the kids, it's just plain fun when the girls come in. "There's a lot of laughter… when they're together," says Regan. "The volume of excitement… it's a wonderful environment. When people walk by the classroom, they want to pop their heads in, because it's such a joyful learning experience."

There's a surprising personal connection for Regan as well. At the time he approached Heschel, Samuels had no idea that she is Freedman's daughter. "He hadn't recognized the connection."

Regan credits her own career in education to her mother's influence. "She loved teaching, and that was part of who she was. It wasn't just her job, it was part of who she was – a teacher, a learner, a mother."

The Writer's Craft course was particularly dear to Freedman's heart. "She loved that Writer's Craft course… She was a wonderful writer, a voracious reader," Regan says. Collaborating with the next generation of Ulpana girls has been "a very interesting and lovely connection."

Samuels agrees that it has given the project "an extra special dimension that none of us was expecting."

The goal of Writer's Craft is to go beyond other English courses, he says. "Most of what we teach in English is not creative writing… it's not just a course, it's a life skill – kids are going to be writing forever."

One goal of the project, says Ulpana's Yael Jakubovic, was to "involve the little kids and see their perspective… as opposed to high school students imagining what little kids would like to read about."

The older girls develop not only writing but also problem-solving skills. Regan says they must realize that they "have their own curriculum and expectations" and are ultimately in charge. "We told them they're the experts. If a plot line is silly or not of the quality they want, [they should] discuss with the students what would be a more appropriate story line."

Working out story lines is a challenge in itself, says Samuels, who enjoys bringing real-life situations into the classroom. "What do you do when the other person wants to talk about aliens and killing… and you want to write a story with a moral?"

This year's stories are being written around ethical themes. These can be as simple as "treat others the way you want to be treated" or "don't wait for someone to ask for your help."

"I'm very proud of what the kids are doing," Samuels says. "Last year, one of my students… Ariel, had as her collaborator from Heschel a girl called Hannah. At the final meeting… Hannah was in absolute tears because it was the last time she would be working with Ariel."

"I have the sense that this is something our kids are going to remember forever."

Day school parents feel the tuition pinch

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

"It's always a struggle, and it's always in the back of my mind," says Ilsa Kamen, a Thornhill mother of five, referring to the cost of Jewish day school tuition.

"I live my life filling out forms – subsidy forms, scholarship forms," as well as a variety of other forms for 11-year-old Avi, who has severe autism and is a student at Zareinu Educational Centre, she added.

In September, Ilsa, a legal secretary, and her husband Howard – a part-time bookkeeper, bar mitzvah teacher and Torah reader – were facing day school tuition costs for their five children totalling $61,000, in addition to the cost of their two oldest daughters' university and college tuition.

The amount included Zareinu arrears of $5,000, Zareinu tuition of $18,000, tuition for two children at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto totalling $26,000 (less a deposit of $1,000), and TanenbaumCHAT arrears of $13,000.

The total represents 55 per cent of their annual before-tax income, Howard said, referring to his pay, Ilsa's pay, and income from a trust left by Ilsa's late father.

Howard said that he and Ilsa also need to save money for Avi's future. "What is going to happen to Avi when Ilsa and I can no longer care for him?" he asked.

The couple reluctantly enrolled Avi in public school this year, pulling him out at the last minute when four people provided private funding after Howard sent an e-mail to synagogue friends.

The Kamens are stretched financially, emotionally and physically. "We don't have the energy," Howard said. Avi wakes up by 5 a.m., and requires full-time care, he explained.

But this year, even given the subsidies the family has been receiving, Ilsa and Howard didn't think they would be able to continue in the Jewish school system, and had enrolled Avi in public school.

"We don't know what's going to happen next year," Howard said.

Ilsa, an Ottawa native who attended Jewish day school through Grade 8, said she and Howard, also a day school graduate, never considered pulling their children out of Jewish school. "That was my upbringing," she said softly.

She understands why some parents opt to leave the system because they don't like the subsidy application process. "It's not a pleasant grilling every year," Ilsa said. "The only thing extravagant that we do is send [four of] the kids to camp. To me, that's as important as their school. They go to Ramah... We don't take trips."

Steven Shulman, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's campaign director and counsel, said that the federation provides schools with a standard tuition subsidy form, which each school can customize, as long as they adhere to the criteria on the form.

The federation in Toronto allocates more money to tuition assistance than any other federation (in total dollars, not per capita), said Shulman, the father of two day school students. "You've got to look deeper than what can the federation provide. The federation provides a lot, but then you have to look at what other answers might there be. This is a process we're starting down right now. There's all kinds of alternatives we're talking about. We've been in dialogue with parents and parent groups. This is certainly a significant issue."

Marcy White
Special to The CJN

Last June, my nine-year-old son, Jacob, heard a school bell and experienced recess for the very first time.

Jacob is in a wheelchair. He can't walk but loves to be pushed as fast as possible, taking the turns as sharply as his chair will allow. He doesn't talk, but has little trouble letting people know what he wants and likes. He gets a thrill out of the rough and tumble play boys are known to love.

From age two to six, Jacob attended Zareinu Educational Centre, a therapy-intensive school. Then I wanted him to attend our local public school so that he could focus on the standard academic curriculum. I was told that this plan was impossible because the building was not wheelchair accessible. Jacob was placed in a "congregated facility," a school where all the children have a physical disability. At first, this was okay. He had a fantastic teacher who knew how to maximize his learning potential.

I still wanted him to be around "regular" kids though.

I broached this topic at Jacob's Identification, Planning and Review Committee (IPRC) meeting last spring when everyone involved in his care met to review his school year and start planning for the upcoming one. I requested that Jacob be placed in a regular classroom for a scheduled block of time on a recurring basis. Everyone at the meeting acknowledged the benefits of this kind of integration, but they were unsure about how to make it happen. There was concern about resources: his school did not have additional assistants to accompany Jacob, nor did they have a driver who could facilitate the transfer. And, most importantly, they didn't know of another school that would welcome such an unorthodox arrangement.

I wanted this for him – over the years, Jacob has had a variety of experiences with children who are developing in "typical" fashion, and they have all been positive. He has enjoyed listening to their little voices and being included in their games. And I love that the kids have seen past Jacob's wheels and limited movement.

A couple of weeks after the IPRC meeting, I followed up with Jacob's principal and attempted to address each of her concerns with the hope of finding a way to integrate Jacob. I acknowledged the challenges in this request but felt that, with some creative thinking, it might be possible. We both agreed to explore our contacts and see if we could find a placement.

We didn't have to look far and quickly located two schools that wanted to welcome my son. The school we chose was the one where the teacher, Cheryl Libman, knew Jacob from a previous year. How wonderful it would be for Jacob and Cheryl to be together again, I thought. They made a great pair: energetic, motivating and loving teacher and eager, attentive and adoring pupil.

Two days before Jacob's first day at Elkhorn Public School, I met with Paul Farrell, the principal. As I sat in Paul's office and answered his questions about my son, I couldn't help but remember my not-so-fruitful conversation with another school administrator the last time I tried to have Jacob exposed to a similar type of student body when he was five years old.

"It would be too traumatic for kids to be around your son" were the words she uttered when I inquired about having some of her students attend my son's school. At the time, her statement made me cringe with fury.

Autistic teen has plenty to say

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Like many teens, Carly Fleischmann, 17, attends gifted classes in a Toronto high school, corresponds with thousands of friends on Facebook and Twitter, and writes a blog.

Carly, however, who was diagnosed with severe autism and an oral motor condition at age two, can only speak through her computer.

A book about the teen, Carly's Voice: Breaking Through Autism, written by her father, Arthur, the president of an advertising agency, and blended with Carly's words, describes the daily struggles and her eventual success in communicating her inner thoughts.

The book begins with Carly, a twin, lagging behind her sister Taryn in such tasks as crawling and toilet training.

Eventually she is diagnosed as pervasively developmentally delayed, a spectrum of disorders that includes autism, and doctors tell Arthur and his wife, Tammy Starr, that Carly is below average intellectually, and will probably need to live in a group home eventually. Life was never peaceful for the Fleischmann family, which also included the twins' brother Matthew. "Once she learned to walk, she immediately began to run, generally headlong into dangerous situations, like a busy street," writes Arthur.

The book begins with Carly at seven years old, missing from the house. Her frantic father runs to the nearby park, where he finds Carly naked and alone. "I felt happy to find her, but I also felt a crush of frustration knowing that this would not be a one-time near-catastrophe."

Years of Carly's erratic behaviour, her parents' sleeplessness and many hours with two devoted therapists finally led to a breakthrough when Carly typed, "Stop, break, bathroom," on her voice box. "Barb and Howie broke into cheers, tears in their eyes."

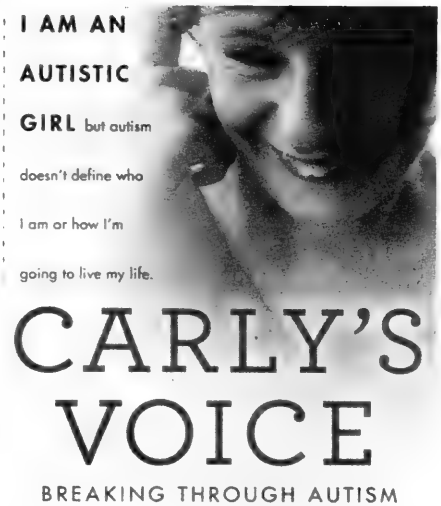
Fleischmann takes us through Carly's bat mitzvah, when she struck up an unlikely long-distance friendship with Ellen Degeneres, media interviews and her entrance into high school.

Throughout the book, we get a glimpse of Carly's "inner voice. "My whole life I was told I couldn't talk. And here is my voice talking to you."

Through her blog, she shares her thoughts about autism. "I have always said that doctors and so-called experts only know a little piece about autism. How could they know the real pieces of autism when they aren't inside our heads and living with it their whole lives." Her goal for the blog, she said, is to educate people about autism, "and at the same time, share with you a glimpse of my life.

"A wise man told me that without knowledge we can't have understanding. Hopefully my blog will give you, not only knowledge but, a chance to help bring understanding to people around you."

And to those who said she'd never learn to communicate, Carly writes: "people who cannot speak still have plenty to say."



'I wondered how other kids would react'

Although I knew she was wrong, a seed of doubt was planted in me. I was afraid that other people in similar positions would be equally as small-minded, and I was worried about exposing my little boy to that destructive thinking. As I recalled that disturbing conversation in Paul's office, I physically shook my head in an effort to rid myself of those thoughts. Instead, I continued telling Paul about my son. He seemed genuinely interested and was impressed that Jacob had met Andrea Boccelli and was a pseudo-television star. It was clear to Paul that Jacob could add a lot of positive energy to his student body.

Later that day, when I explained to Jacob that Cheryl would be his teacher once a week, his mouth opened and he let out an excited scream, accompanied by some squirming in his chair. It was obvious this idea pleased him. But, two days later as we drove to the school, Jacob started protesting and making noises. When I asked if he was scared and nervous, he nodded his head. I reassured him, saying I would stay with him as long as he wanted.

As I transferred Jacob from the van to his wheelchair, Cheryl came running over to us and began enthusiastically describing the plan for the afternoon. I couldn't help but smile when I saw the excitement on my son's face and heard the animation in Cheryl's voice. I asked Jacob if I could leave, and he didn't hesitate before nodding his head affirmatively. I desperately wanted this event to be a success. A few hours later, I walked into the school to pick up my son, anxious to learn how it went. I knew Jacob would be comfortable and safe with Cheryl, but I wondered how the other kids would react to him. The description I received from Cheryl was surpassed only by the sights I witnessed the following week upon our return.

Students and teachers lined up to meet the newcomer. There were some questions, including, "Why is he wearing a wheelchair?" but these inquiries were posed with innocence and acceptance – there was no fear or trauma involved.

When I dropped him off the next time, Jacob was presented with a hand-drawn sign that read: "Welcome Back Jacob." The artists were three students who had not been able to meet him the previous week but wanted to be among the first to do so upon his return. It warmed my heart to witness the little people congregated around Jacob's wheelchair, bending down so he could see their faces as they introduced themselves. When it became apparent that Jacob thought sneezing was hysterical, the room filled with faux-sneezes in attempts to elicit Jacob's contagious full-body laughter. The scene filled me with a sense of contentment.

So far, this unconventional arrangement has been outstanding and everyone has benefited from it. Jacob loves being around these warm and accepting children and he continues to do what he does best: grabbing the hearts of those who come close and refusing to let go.

Putting our foot down

Cathy Indig
Special to The CJN

I can still remember my mother's frequent expression: "I am putting my foot down."

Of course, she didn't mean this in a literal sense. She meant she wasn't budging, and nothing I could say would change her mind.

Do I agree with this approach of not listening to a child's perspective? Not completely. However, 40 years later, I believe we've lost sight of even the figurative sense of those words.

Children as young as one year old are literally putting their foot down when asked to do something, and screaming "no" at the same time.

The worst part is that, unlike my mother, the parents are giving in.

What is this teaching the children? Whenever they don't want to do something, just scream, cry or hit, and then they will get their way.

Parents say they don't understand why their children don't listen. But how many times has the parent said something and the child didn't have to listen?

I often hear parents ask their children if they would like to leave, and the quick response is a loud "NO."

The mom or dad's next words are often, "Okay, sweetie, we can stay five more minutes." Five minutes later, the same scenario occurs.

The problems are clear: Why is the child permitted to angrily say no and then get his or her way? And why is the parent asking if the child would like to leave in the first place?

Since my mother's day, parenting methods have gone from one extreme to the other. Luckily, there is a happy in-between.

Cathy Indig

In this situation, the best approach is to tell the child you are leaving in 10 minutes. Although young children have little sense of time, this lets them know they must finish soon.

When the time is up, a parent can kindly say, "We need to leave now." No questions, no choices.

The child may be angry the first few times you try this, but will soon learn that you mean what you say.

I'm not saying we shouldn't give kids choices.

Give them lots of choices for the things that are negotiable, remembering always that the child doesn't rule the house.

Negotiable is whether they want a grilled cheese or tuna sandwich for lunch, not whether they want to eat at the table or run around the restaurant with their food.

They can choose what colour of socks to wear, which book to read, or which toy to play with.

Children need to learn socially acceptable behaviours, and parents are their most important teachers.

Envision a child of three who has moved from a crib to a big bed. On Day 1, the child comes out every 10 minutes with excuse after excuse. The parent gives the child water, brings the child to the bathroom, reads another story or gives 20 more hugs. And the child learns that the parent will keep coming, no matter what.

By 11 p.m. on Day 10, the parents are exasperated and exhausted. From Day 1, the child needs to know that he or she is expected to stay in bed. Make sure all legitimate needs are taken care of, and perhaps keep a glass of water next to the bed.

If the child comes out with an excuse, remind them that this need was taken care of and send them back to bed, even if they're crying. This is hard, but it is harder, in the long run, to not teach them what is expected.

Children need stability in their lives. Part of this comes from seeing parents and teachers as people who can keep them safe, and part of it comes from rules.

Rules give kids grounding as to what is expected. They help children take ownership of their actions and let them take pride in doing something good.

Children may behave badly if they want attention, but when they get attention for doing appropriate things, they'll learn to prefer positive attention.

We are so afraid of disappointing our children and seeing them sad that we are willing to eliminate any possible sadness by allowing them to do whatever they like.

We want our children to be happy, but that doesn't mean they don't need rules.

In my school, I don't believe in time-outs, but I do believe children need to follow community expectations so that they fit in wherever they go.

We need parents to share this vision, so that children hear the same messages at school and at home.

Who is putting their foot down now? Hopefully, today, it is a combination of children making positive choices and standing up for what they believe in, and parents who want what is best for their children – the ability to understand and follow socially acceptable behaviours.

Two schools collaborate on environmental project

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When Leo Baeck Day School's head Eric Petersiel and Robbins Hebrew Academy's (RHA) head Claire Sumerlus learned about the ClimateSpark Social Venture Challenge – a contest that called on non-profit groups to pitch ideas to reduce Toronto's climate impact – they eagerly jumped on the opportunity to get involved.

"For many years we've had a focus on environmental education and how it relates to Judaism, but to date, everything we've ever found has always only been qualitative education," Petersiel said.

This project, he added, allowed his students to put theory into practice. Two staff members, one from each school, worked together to draft a proposal to enter the ClimateSpark challenge.

Leo Baeck and RHA came up with an "Inter-School Collaboration for Conservation Quantification" project that called on Grade 8 students and teachers to develop measurable energy-reduction actions in their schools.

"It's all nice and good for our kids to say, 'Here's why you should have litter-less lunch'… and philosophically, it makes a lot of sense, but that is a very hard sell until you can quantify the results," Petersiel said.

He said the idea is that students would track how much energy their schools use by measuring the electric bill, gas bill and water bill.

"Those bills have incredibly detailed metrics of usage, so we can simply chart them and in any month, you can identify… if you used more and decide how you can cut down your impact that would save dollars and also have a positive [carbon] footprint impact."

Petersiel said people tend to focus on habits that are easy to curb, such as turning off the lights, rather than making changes that will have the most impact.

"But the reality is that turning off the lights is a shockingly small piece of the actual measurement factor," he said.

"Should we be replacing windows, or installing solar panels on the roof? If you have a real understanding of the actual physical impact… you can have a much more intelligent conversation about which habits are going to impact real change."

Sumerlus said the project is about changing the way we think.

"That's how you can have a green effect," she said.

According to the proposal, the goal is to "establish a set of actions which can be done within schools, between schools in the same city or region, and between schools in different countries."

The plan is to use social media to connect and work with other schools involved in the project.

Sumerlus boasted that of the 60 proposals submitted by non-profit organizations, Leo Baeck and RHA are the only schools that entered the ClimateSpark competition.

She hopes that the lessons the students learn from their involvement with the project will affect their day-to-day lives.

"The kids can actually measure what they're doing, and they'll be doing it both in the school and in their homes."

However, until there is a commitment from an investor to fund the project, the kids' involvement is limited to making suggestions to improve on the idea.

In November, the proposal was selected as one of the top 10 finalists, making the Jewish schools eligible for $50,000 grants that were awarded to the three winners.

Although their project wasn't chosen as one of the three winners at a gala in February, Petersiel said two of the 26-member panel of venture capitalists – who pulled together grants, loan funds and equity investments to allocate to the projects – are still considering funding the proposal.

If an investor does commit to the project, the kids will be responsible for putting the idea into practice.

"They'll be the ones doing the work –measuring, deciding what they're measuring, how they're measuring and so on," Sumerlus said.

Regardless of where the project goes from here, Sumerlus said it's been a great experience.

"I know a lot more about improving carbon footprints than I did before."

She said the lessons the students are learning about environmental accountability falls in line with Jewish values.

"We're hoping that some of the project will be done through Judaic studies where they talk about passages about the environment," Sumerlus said.

"Taking care of your community and where you live… falls in line with the teaching that we do."

Communities need a central agency for Jewish education

Seymour Epstein
Special to The CJN

In the history of federated Jewish communities across North America, some form of central agency for Jewish education has always been an integral part of communal organization.

These agencies used to be called boards or bureaus of Jewish education, and all large communities, along with many smaller cities, had one form or another of the same institution.

There are good reasons for the fact that most of these agencies changed their names in the last few years.

Although they, like the schools in their communities, were modelled after the public system, they never became the equivalent of a public board.

The mass immigration of Jews to North America coincided with the establishment and early development of public schooling, and resulted in the almost universal acceptance of the North American classroom as the model for Jewish schooling of all types.

As public schools established oversight boards, community leaders felt that a similar structure was needed for Jewish schooling, especially in the large communities.

Seymour Epstein

But, with few exceptions, these boards did not control curriculum, and none of them financed the schools as the public boards did.

Eventually, the various boards of New York, Boston, Toronto and other communities found their niche in the nexus of community and Jewish education. Some, like Cleveland and New York, produced learning material. Others, especially Toronto, stressed tuition support for less affluent families.

Sooner or later, most boards of Jewish education realized that they were not parallel to the public boards and changed their names to Central Agency for Jewish Education, the Jewish Education Project, Centre for Jewish Education, and the like.

Communities structured their Jewish education agencies in various modes.

In some communities, the board is a committee of the federation, in others an independent body funded primarily by federation, and in yet others a separate organ funded outside of central federation dollars.

What they all had in common was the mission of enhancing Jewish education in quantity and quality, and the vision of a literate and Jewish-identifying population. Recently, though, some of these agencies that were funded directly or indirectly by federations have either ceased to exist or have been restructured to become something other than their original form.

In arguing for their continuing existence (indeed, their growth and development), one might ask what the need is for such an agency if day schools, complementary schools, adult education, camps and youth groups share the mission and vision described above.

In fact, the educational institutions do operate with those same goals, but their perspective is radically different from that of a community agency.

Schools cater to a specific demographic of geography, ideology and income level, and while some schools are more open and pluralistic, they, too, have their boundaries.

But an important raison d'être of a central agency is its communal perspective. It must concern itself with all the Jews in the community – affiliated, less affiliated, and even the indifferent and disaffected.

Its overwhelming passion must be that no Jew gets cheated out of our rich heritage of values, literature, culture, spirituality and history, in whatever doses are suited to any particular family.

Where a specific school or camp is available and suitable, the family should be encouraged to enrol. And where a community demographic exists that does not fit what is available, every effort should be made to create an educational environment suitable for it.

It is this view from the top – which goes way beyond "the community" and searches for any and all communities of Jews – that is unique to a central agency.

Of course, Chabad has that view, but Lubavitch Chassidism isn't for everybody!

Which brings me to the next aspect of a central body for Jewish education: pluralism. Not tolerance or respect, but a 21st-century perspective on Jewish peoplehood that realizes that the modern period changed the face of Jewish life and that the post-modern age will change us even more.

Agency must be committed to pluralism and inclusivity

Ever since the European Enlightenment, Jews have defined themselves in many different ways within spiritual, cultural, and national domains, and those multifaceted perspectives continue to develop and change in the 21st century.

The true pluralist will also realize that not every Jew need subscribe to the authenticity of all Jewish paths.

This kind of pluralism permits Jews of many different views to engage in meaningful dialogue without abandoning their own strongly held perspectives.

It permits a flexibility that leads to growth in thought and spirit. On the negative side, it admits that – strangely – intolerance is as rampant among liberals as it is among the less liberal.

True pluralism has its difficulties with fanaticism, but it also has the potential to create a new positive fanaticism of the pluralist sort.

Pluralism has already created its own communities, which must be on guard against the kind of self-righteousness that destroys the pluralist spirit.

A central agency, by 21st-century definition, must be totally committed to a pluralist and inclusive agenda while guarding the rights of individual employees and lay leaders to have and share their own Jewish path.

From a communal perspective, a central agency must be even more pluralistic than a "community school."

Another attribute of a central agency must be its dual concern for both identity and literacy.

There was a time, not long ago, when formal education was seen as leading to literacy, while the informal modes of camping, youth groups and educational travel were viewed as the realm of identity formation.

Much has been written about the failure of some schools to even produce literacy, and some Jewish camps do little in the domain of identity.

That, of course, deserves ongoing attention. More recently, it has been suggested that one without the other is just as counter-productive.

The various community arms of Jewish education, formal and informal, will continue to do what they do best, but, here again, a central agency has a unique role of co-ordinating the paths to literacy and identity by assisting its partners to blend the formal and the informal where possible.

This can only be accomplished by one community body that has influence in both spheres of education. Separating them is a recipe for keeping literacy and identity sterile, one without the other.

Every large community must fashion the central body according to its particular structure and needs, but all agencies of this sort should consider the following menu:

- In-service training and consultation for all educational institutions at all levels of staff: educators, management and administration;
- Educational planning for the community at large;
- Consultation and training for Jewish education lay leadership;
- Co-ordination and planning for central events such as Bible contests, festivals and other inter-school activities;
- Establishing and guiding "communities of practice" (groups of professionals who study together around common themes of concern) for like-minded educators;
- Funding that enhances the quality of education, and financial assistance that increases capacity by permitting more learners in the system;
- Cutting-edge, visionary thinking that challenges the status quo.

Some agencies will excel in certain domains where others fail, but an ongoing review with input from all stakeholders and wannabe partners should keep the body on track.

In this respect, there is a lesson to be learned from the tradition. The study of Torah is the mitzvah that leads to all other mitzvot, but it is also a mitzvah in its own right.

Certainly, the major goal of a central agency is to assist schools, camps and youth groups, but the process of running a central agency is also an educational experience for its staff, lay leaders and "clients" – the great variety of Jews in any contemporary community.

If we have learned anything from our history, it is that a community that cares deeply about Jewish education as a lifelong activity is a community that adapts well to changing realities, and ensures Jewish creativity and growth, not mere continuity.

Such a community, with the ongoing intervention of a central agency, will recognize that Jewish education is essential to all Jewish life, that it must pervade all the organs of the community, and that it is strategic. Indeed, as I have written and said many times, "Jewish education is the strategic plan of the Jewish people."

Seymour Epstein (Epi) is the former director of Toronto's Mercaz, formerly the Board of Jewish Education.

New yeshiva offers tools to succeed

Michael Isenberg
Special to The CJN

Boys at Yeshivas Binyan HaTorah dive into Jewish studies as any yeshiva students would. But while other yeshivot teach Talmud and Halachah in depth, in Hebrew or Aramaic, Binyan HaTorah students study The Path of the Just, a book on Jewish ethics in English.

That's because Binyan HaTorah is a 10-student school for boys with mild learning disabilities.

"Our boys work hard, and they succeed in their studies," says Rabbi Moish Krocotski, principal and founder of the school.

In its second year, Binyan HaTorah is unique for being one of the only yeshivot in Toronto for students with exceptionalities.

With other yeshivot unable to accommodate students with special needs, parents within the religious community wanted a new school that would provide an environment that supports the students' needs.

They approached Rabbi Krocotski, who'd had a positive impact on many boys in his 10 years with the remedial program at Yeshiva Yesodei HaTorah.

Whether they have severe anxiety, attention deficit disorder, mild behavioural issues, or difficulty with memory, Binyan HaTorah enables its boys to succeed in a Torah-based environment.

The remedy, says Rabbi Krocotski, is accommodating the boys' learning needs.

The school has three Jewish studies teachers, allowing for small group classes and one-on-one attention. There is also an English teacher and a few others for general studies.

"We create engaging learning opportunities by doing fun activities," says assistant teacher Jason Renard. "Our classes are shorter than other yeshivas. We provide frequent breaks for them. We play games and create a welcoming environment."

Rabbi Krocotski says he even individualizes each student's tests to focus on his personal strengths.

"I love it," says 18-year-old Yerachmiel Weiss, a first-year student. "There is no point in testing us on things we don't know. It doesn't mean we are going to get perfect, because the tests are reasonable."

Renard says the key is tailoring the learning to each student's interest and capability. "I had a student who literally could not remember anything you taught him and yet he learned the first two aliyot of Parshat Noach. It was [the] one-on-one attention we're able to give students here. We only spent five minutes a day learning a few lines of the parshah, and would do the same lines the next day. Eventually he started picking it up. But it's also the relationship we created… I would say, 'How are you doing?' and not 'How is your learning going?' "

Rabbi Moish Krocotski studies Gemara with some of his students.

Despite learning non-traditional texts such as The Path of the Just, the boys do have classes on Halachah, Mishnah, Talmud and chumash. The difference is that they are mostly optional.

"[Teachers] allow us to choose our classes," says 17-year-old Chanoch Greenwood, a second-year student. "They encourage us to learn certain subjects or to learn in more depth, but they understand if we're not there yet."

Binyan HaTorah's mission statement strives "for students to seek success as productive members of klal Yisrael, as individuals committed to Torah learning and observance, and as contributing members of society."

Though the school is not certified to grant the Ontario Secondary School Diploma this year, Rabbi Krocotski plans to provide high school credits next year.

The school offers two general studies tracks: an academic stream to graduate high school and a "trades" stream for those who want to work right after school.

After its first-year success, the yeshiva moved from a single room at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto to multiple rooms in the basement of Congregation B'nai Torah. The ultimate goal is for the school to have a building of its own, with more staff and students.

"All we need is funding," says Renard. "That is the only thing from making us huge."

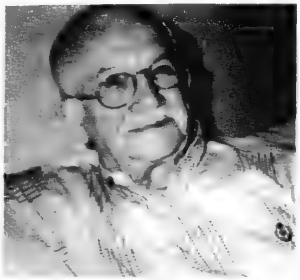
A legacy of education

Ilanna Sharon Mandel
Special to The CJN

In December, my father, Edward Yuditsky, lost a brave battle with cancer at age 91.

His legacy will be handed down for years to come: a career that spanned 50-plus years, educating generations of Jewish children in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Ontario.

In each school where he served as teacher or principal – sometimes both at the same time – he was revered as a progressive educator who believed in empowering the spirits and minds of his students.



Edward Yuditsky

Although his family was poor because of the Communist takeover of all their property in Russia, our dad, who immigrated with his family at age five, was determined to become a teacher.

As a young boy growing up in Winnipeg, he found sanctuary in his neighbourhood synagogue whenever the difficulties of the Depression and family hardships overwhelmed him.

Even though he could never afford college, he was mentored by other Jewish educators who recognized his potential.

As a relatively young man, he became principal of the Talmud Torah Elementary School in Winnipeg. After our family moved to Regina, he served as principal of the Hebrew school at Beth Jacob Synagogue. Later, when we moved to Toronto in 1974, my dad taught at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

His career ended only at the age of 85, when he retired after 13 years of leading the junior congregation at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

I vividly recall that he often answered my questions with a story, which would lead to more questions and ultimately more stories.

Dad strongly believed that the ability to sustain ourselves through our stories and learning has been, and continues to be, one of the paths to salvation for the Jewish people.

My father often said that the innate beauty of the Jewish faith, and our unique history, must never be forgotten.

I have met many of his students over the years who recalled a kind, warm-spirited man who influenced their own choices in life.

His ability to invigorate his students was evidenced by the number of them who came to his shivah. As well, former participants in Beth David's junior congregation have dedicated a Facebook page to the man who lovingly directed their services for so many years.

My father taught that a person does not have to be religious or even observant to appreciate the importance of education.

As a teacher and principal, my dad taught his students, including me, to open ourselves up to new ideas while continuing to cherish the old.

He believed that it is through our educational programs that we train the next generation to assume Jewish leadership. If young people lack an appreciation for their heritage, then we will lose part of the essence of who we are.

One of the ways in which our father encouraged continuing education was to engage both parents and students in the Junior Congregation.

Before his time at Beth David, he started junior congregations in Winnipeg and Regina.

The concept of co-ordinating a service for Jewish students up to bar/bat mitzvah age, together with their parents, encourages parents and their children to connect on a deeper level. They have an opportunity to embrace learning Torah and Haftorah together. As children prepare for their ascent into Jewish adulthood, parents are given the gift of re-embracing their own learning.

For more than half a century, our father ignited a passion for education in people of all ages. He often sought out obscure texts for new stories that would educate and entertain at the same time.

An easygoing man who genuinely loved children, he delighted in the opportunity to teach them something new.

His gift was a genuine love of knowledge, which he was determined to pass on to as many students as possible.

Personally, I will always cherish the fact that he taught me to chant the Haftorah. I sing it to this day, and it provides me with a valuable way of participating in my own synagogue in the Beach Hebrew Institute.

Perhaps my fondest memory will be of the only time we chanted together, in Beth David Synagogue last August on the occasion of my late mother's yarzheit.

The greatest lesson from my father's life is to remember who we are, and hold on to that great fabric of Jewish history that binds us together with a collective love of knowledge and learning.

Orthodox homeschoolers defend their choice

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

We all try to make the best choices for our kids' education: academically, emotionally and spiritually. That's why many of my fellow homeschoolers were shocked to open the religious weekly Yated Ne'eman a few weeks ago to find eight rabbis, leading educators, speaking out against this choice.

The weekly Chinuch Roundtable began with an anonymous question from a reader hoping to withdraw her daughter from school for "a year away from the social pressures and stress."

Responses went far beyond socialization. Rabbi Yaakov Bender of Far Rockaway, N.Y., jumped in to call homeschooling "a fad bordering on epidemic," and each rabbi in turn seemed determined to curb the "epidemic" as forcefully as possible.

Rabbi Dovid Engel, principal of The Toronto Cheder, an Orthodox boys' elementary school, worried that parents might talk to homeschoolers who would "defend their choices instead of giving accurate pros and cons." Perhaps he means parents like me, who rave about how much our kids are learning and growing, and what a privilege it is to join them along the way.

I called Rabbi Engel to clarify, and he explained that while the Torah's responsibility to educate children falls on parents, as early as the first century CE, children were losing out. "Parents weren't educated enough, or [they] were labourers who didn't have the time that the children needed." Rabbi Yehoshuah ben Gamla stepped in to create elementary schools that grew into today's cheders and day schools.

Yet, Rabbi Engel said, "school is not only about academics. The most successful children… are those that do well socially." Socialization may be possible for some children through sports leagues, Boy Scouts and other extracurricular programs, but, "in a more haredi world… in our circles, that's not true."

As a principal, Rabbi Engel lists four essential ingredients for any teacher: "Foremost… is to have a connection with the rebbe [teacher]." He must also teach so that each student feels he can grasp the material, be punctual and act as a role model. Though Rabbi Engel says it's important to develop connections beyond the home, he admits that "parents are certainly all those four things."

However, he also wrote that "parents may fancy themselves as great teachers, but in reality they're not."

I suspect that, like paid teachers, some teaching parents truly are great and most are pretty good. Few are lazy, yet Rabbi Nosson Scherman, general editor of Artscroll Publications, who began his career in education, wrote that parents' "drive to learn and teach will dwindle as the weeks go by."

For six years, I schlepped my children 45 minutes to school, every school day. Did my "drive" to drop them off at school dwindle as the weeks went by? You bet, but they never missed a day. Some homeschool days are more inspiring than others, but you don't stop showing up, which is lucky, because the good days – a symphony concert where your toddler whispers excitedly, "That's a French horn!" or the moment your kid "gets" the link between Ancient Persia and the Purim story – are truly great.

Yet Rabbi Shneur Aisenstark of Beth Jacob Seminary in Montreal wrote that he'd only recommend homeschooling "when there is absolutely no other alternative," while Rabbi Bender suggested it be "left only for those who cannot function in a classroom – a handicapped or learning disabled child." Yael Aldrich, a Maryland homeschooler helping to organize the fourth annual Torah Home Education Conference in Baltimore this May, says, "These rabbis have never met a homeschooling family who have done it for positive reasons.

"They've met families who are homeschooling because… a child is being bullied, a school can't deal with the special needs of a child. That's one way to come into homeschooling. Other people want to come to a place where their family is the centre of their life."

Homeschooling is hard work. Even those who "unschool" (where learning follows children's interests) usually educate themselves first, then plan and implement the best education for each child. Nobody should write this process off as a fad.

Rabbi Avrohom Neuberger, an educator and translator for Artscroll's Schottenstein Talmud, offered a rare quasi-positive insight, listing three modern rabbinic leaders who studied unconventionally: "I guess the gamble sometimes pays off." Rabbi Bender, too, sees homeschooling as playing dice with our kids' souls: "We have all seen too many korbanos [sacrifices]. Don't gamble with your children."

Beneath these responses is a veiled threat that children who aren't in Torah schools could be lost to Judaism. No parent wants to gamble with her kids, but faith that the education system will keep kids religious is also a gamble. If even one school offered a guarantee that graduates would love and live Torah forever, I'd sign up my kids in a heartbeat.

Aldrich, who began educating her four children at home with the blessing of an Orthodox rabbi who used to homeschool his own kids, says, "We don't have any control over what happens to the neshamas [souls] that HaShem entrusted us with. We don't say… they're going to be chassidic if we're chassidic.

"We put our energy into them, try our best to do that, and daven a lot." She hopes her children will appreciate the effort she puts into their education, and grow into "Ovdei [servants of] HaShem in their own way… whether they look or act different from me."

Aldrich sees the rabbis' responses as insecurity. "I was disappointed that they felt a need to belittle a different method of educating Jewish children." Rabbi Engel stresses that this was not the rabbis' intention: "A lot of thought goes into our answers."

Despite the controversy, plans for the Torah home education conference continue. Aldrich hopes homeschooling will grow, inspiring more parents "to take full responsibility for their children's education." Yet there's no threat to established institutions, she says. "Most people don't live a lifestyle in which homeschooling will be honestly possible… We're going to need those schools."

Just as she has learned from friends who are classroom educators, Aldrich hopes the educational world will find something to learn from homeschoolers. "More honest give and take will be good for everybody."

Community urged to 'come up with creative solutions'

About four years ago, UJA Federation determined that, given the number of students in the day school system, it would need an endowment of approximately $750 million to cut the costs in half across the board, Shulman said.

"The answer has to be to work with parents in the schools to build on some alternative options," Shulman said.

Wayne Levin, who in the 1990s was involved in lobbying for government funding for Jewish day schools, has three children, ages 13, 17 and 20, all of whom were pulled out of their Jewish day schools for issues not relating to tuition.

Taking them out was "very painful.

"I wanted them to have a good Jewish grounding, which I didn't get," Levin said. However, he added, "Every year the form letter goes out with yet another increase… I can't say I miss paying."

Instead of full-day Jewish school, the Levins opted for alternatives such as after-school tutoring and Jewish youth groups, but, he noted, they're "not ideal."

Joseph (Yossi) Adler, a lawyer and father of three whose wife is a trustee in bankruptcy, said day school tuition can run to more than $55,000 for three children.

Despite their solid dual incomes, "We find it difficult," said Adler, who identifies as modern Orthodox and as a "parent activist" on tuition and other communal matters.

As well, he noted, there is – for his family and many others – the cost of eating kosher, paying synagogue dues, sending kids to Jewish summer camp and owning a house in Toronto. "That's where it becomes prohibitive for a lot of people."

It's "a common thing" for parents to refinance their homes, he said.

In the Orthodox world there's communal pressure to send children to Jewish day school, he added. "There's a message that's sent to your friends, relatives and community members that you're not a committed Jew if you don't."

As well, he said, parents want their children to have Jewish friends and a stronger Jewish identity, and even modern Orthodox Jews, not just haredim, are concerned about influences from the outside world at non-Jewish schools.

Tuition has become a form of birth control, he added.

Adler believes high tuition costs will have a detrimental impact on contributions to UJA and other communal organizations. "If our leaders continue to announce to the world that we subsidize Jewish education more than any federation, that alone will not cut it. That does not make an impact on the community.

"If the community doesn't come up with creative solutions, then parents will make their own decisions," he warned. "Increasingly, people are thinking about public school as an option."

Leonard, a father of five grown children who didn't want his real name used, said he and his wife had "no way around" asking for a subsidy. Over the years, he said, the subsidies started "drying up" and he had to pay an increasing percentage of tuition.

He and his wife made do by using a line of credit and renewing their mortgage. "I didn't send my kids to school. My house sent the kids to school," he said, noting that he has no other investments, and the house still has a "sizable" mortgage even though his kids are out of the school system. "Fortunately, property values keep going up. What happens if they go down?... The fact that we still have the debt is kind of unsettling."

Pulling their children from Jewish day school wasn't an option for the Orthodox family. "We're committed to Yiddishkeit. Our kids needed to get a Jewish education."

He believes that other forms of Jewish education don't offer "the same kind of Jewish grounding" as day school. That's the sad part of it… A day school education is something that sticks with people."

"We don't live exorbitantly," said Leonard, who described his salary as "pretty good." Instead of vacations, he added, "we basically did local stuff." As well, their kids didn't attend summer camp, because of the cost, and extracurricular activities were limited.

"It wasn't until years later that they told us it affected their social life. They weren't part of the chevra."

He added: "Most of the people I work with have a cottage, a boat. I think to myself, they invested in that; I invested in my kids. I don't feel bitter, but I guess I felt the unfairness.

"I'm not angry at the system. I'm very grateful for what we got that helped us get through."

He said the financial burden for day school parents has grown proportionately larger since his parents' day.

Leonard, who has served on a tuition committee himself, said "I realized they did the best they could for me, but it still wasn't enough."

Sadly, he noted, there are parents "who try to bilk the system… on paper it would look like they earned nothing."

The ultimate answer, he said, is that the government of Ontario "has to realize the inequity" of day school parents paying taxes for education and not getting any funding in return.

Age no barrier to sharing knowledge

Israeli President Shimon Peres last week met with Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg, left, and Google co-founder Sergey Brin, both of whom have helped change the world of technology and information sharing. The 88-year-old Peres visited Facebook headquarters and enlisted the 27-year-old Zuckerberg's help in launching a personal Facebook page aimed at creating dialogue with young Arabs who live in countries that lack diplomatic ties with Israel. While still in California, Peres met with Sergey Brin, 38, at Google's headquarters, where Brin showed Peres a prototype of the driverless car that Google will soon be presenting to the public. [Christophe Wu and Israel Sun photos]

Abbas threatens to dismantle the PA

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian issue has been pushed to the margins of Israeli and world media attention in recent weeks, as well as to that of the diplomatic agenda.

The massacre in Syria, the presidential elections in Russia and the increasing tension with Iran have held the attention of Washington, the United Nations and western Europe.

The lack of interest in the Palestinian issue was a source of frustration for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and his advisers. And the fact that Israeli officials were delighted that the Palestinian issue barely came up during Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's talks with U.S. President Barack Obama last week only increased the frustration in Ramallah.

Analysis

Western diplomats and Israeli officials said that despite the fact the issue has been sidelined, officials in Ramallah are planning to take a diplomatic step that has been worked on diligently last week.

Abbas and his advisers finished putting together a letter to be delivered to Netanyahu, most likely by the end of this week. The letter will reportedly place the blame on Israel for the freeze in the peace process and will offer an ultimatum to Netanyahu.

Store Owner Dies

MONTREAL — Steven Kirman, founder and owner of the iconic Steve's Music Store, which sold everything from amplifiers to guitar picks, died March 3 after a brief illness at age 65. Customers at the store, established in 1965 on St. Antoine (then Craig) Street West near a string of pawn shops, included Céline Dion, Sam Roberts and April Wine, as well as many other professional and amateur musicians. The store became known throughout North America and expanded to nine locations at its peak, including stores in Ottawa and Toronto.

IAW Condemned

OTTAWA — Citizenship Minister Jason Kenney condemned Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), the annual anti-Israel event that takes place on many Canadian university campuses, saying it creates "a toxic environment that prevents meaningful dialogue." He was joined by interim Liberal Leader Bob Rae, who said IAW singles out and demonizes one country while ignoring atrocities elsewhere, including in Syria. Conservative York Centre MP Mark Adler also called the event "hate-filled" and a "smear campaign," while Toronto city councillor James Pasternak called IAW "offensive and repugnant."

More Money Sought

WINNIPEG — The charitable arm of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights CMHR), now being built in Winnipeg, has raised its fundraising goal from $150 million to $200 million, its head, Gail Asper, told the Globe and Mail. The group has raised $130 million so far, on top of $100 million pledged by Ottawa and $64 million in total from the governments of Manitoba and Winnipeg. Originally $265 million, building costs have risen to more than $350 million. The national museum was the dream of Asper's late father and will be the first outside Ottawa.

DA Probes Infant Death After Brit Ritual

NEW YORK — The Brooklyn District Attorney's office is investigating the death of an infant from herpes following a controversial circumcision-related rite as a possible criminal matter, a newspaper reported.

A spokesperson for DA Charles Hynes told the New York Jewish Week that the office's Crimes Against Children Bureau is investigating.

The report of the death of the unidentified infant last Sept. 28 at Brooklyn's Maimonides Medical Center apparently sparked the investigation. The cause of death was listed as "disseminated herpes simplex virus Type 1, complicating ritual circumcision with oral suction," according to the New York Daily News.

The report comes more than six years after a controversy erupted in New York City over the haredi practice of metzitzah b'peh, which involves a mohel orally suctioning blood from a circumcision wound. The controversy arose when an infant died from herpes after metzitzah b'peh. The baby's twin was also infected. Another child circumcised the previous year by the same mohel also contracted herpes. The mohel denied being the cause.

The New York health department then issued a warning against the practice, which haredi leaders called unnecessary and unwelcome. Haredi leaders have resisted calls to replace direct oral suction with alternative approaches, such as the use of a sterile tube.

Hoops Team Loses

DALLAS — An Orthodox Houston high school lost its Saturday night state basketball final 46-42 March 3 in Dallas after fighting for the right not to play on Shabbat. Robert M. Beren Academy had won a semi-final game the previous day that had been scheduled for Friday night. It and the final were moved after Beren's captain, along with teammates and parents, filed suit against the Texas Association of Private and Parochial Schools. The athletic league had earlier rejected two appeals by Beren Academy to move the games, saying Beren Academy knew tournament games are played on Friday nights and Saturday when it joined in 2009.

CIJA setting up community security force

Doron Horowitz

Focus to remain on passive observation

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is looking for a few good men and women.

It's organizing a recruitment drive to find Jewish volunteers to train in the arts of passive observation and deterrence to increase the sense of security in Canada's major Jewish population centres.

The initiative is called the "community security network" and is touted as being similar to a neighbourhood watch program, only on a national scale.

Doron Horowitz, CIJA's director of national security infrastructure and head of the new initiative, told The CJN that the project aims to have the Canadian Jewish community take more responsibility for its own security and project the image that it's looking out for itself.

"We will be less reliant on external [security] resources and will… complement law enforcement," he said. "This is the Jewish community taking an active role in [its own] security on a civilian level."

Horowitz will begin training 25 volunteers in Toronto starting next month before eventually recruiting members in Ottawa, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary and Vancouver, although not necessarily in that order.

(One notable exception is Montreal, where the Jewish community has its own security program in place, for which Horowitz said he's serving as an adviser.)

Recruits will not carry or use weapons, and training sessions in Toronto will take place at unnamed facilities around town, he said.

Horowitz – a security specialist and a decorated ex-Israeli Defence Forces officer, with specialized training in counter-terrorism – said he hopes to bring in local police to speak to the volunteers to help them understand their role and limitations.

Most of the training, he said, won't be physical in nature. Instead, it will focus on preventative measures and methods.

Save the Christians

From the editor's desk...

Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, is a compelling figure. Soldier, scholar, writer, thinker, the American-born diplomat is a distinguished and imposing figure.

Since his Washington appointment almost three years ago, he has frequently proved his strength of intellect and mettle of character representing the Jewish state to the decision-makers of the American administration, the legislators of Congress, fellow diplomats, hyper-inquisitive, cynical media and even thuggish, derisvely heckling university students. He is a man of exceptional capabilities. He writes and speaks authoritatively.

It is for that reason, therefore, important to call readers' attention to an op-ed essay Oren wrote last week for the Wall Street Journal called "Israel and the plight of Mideast Christians."

In crisp, concise prose, Oren tells readers of the rising dangers for and the declining numbers of Christians throughout the Middle East, save in one country: Israel.

"The church in Bethlehem had survived more than 1,000 years, through wars and conquests, but its future now seemed in jeopardy," Oren begins the article. "Spray-painted all over its ancient stone walls were the Arabic letters for Hamas. The year was 1994 and the city was about to pass from Israeli to Palestinian control. I was meeting with the church's clergy as an Israeli government adviser on inter-religious affairs. They were despondent but too frightened to file a complaint. The same Hamas thugs who had desecrated their sanctuary were liable to take their lives.

"The trauma of those priests is now commonplace among Middle Eastern Christians."

Oren writes that Christians now comprise less than five per cent of the Middle East's population. A century ago, Christians constituted some 20 per cent. And even this meagre five per cent, he sadly points out, is a rapidly declining figure.

Citing facts and figures Oren brings shocking illustrations of rabidly anti-Christian behaviour in, for example, Egypt, Iraq and Iran.

His most elaborate illustrations however relate to the harassment of the Christian communities in the Palestinian territories. "Since the Hamas takeover of Gaza in 2007, half the Christian community has fled. Christmas decorations and public displays of crucifixes are forbidden. In a December 2010 broadcast, Hamas officials exhorted Muslims to slaughter their Christian neighbours. Rami Ayad, owner of Gaza's only Christian bookstore, was murdered, his store reduced to ash."

"The West Bank is also hemorrhaging Christians," Oren adds. "Once 15 per cent of the population, they now make up less than two per cent." But by pointing to the overall economic prosperity of key Arab cities in the West Bank, he effectively skewers the specious and simply incorrect arguments that attribute the Christian exodus from the West Bank to Israeli administrative and economic policies.

"Under Israeli auspices, [Bethlehem's] Christian population grew by 57 per cent. But under the Palestinian Authority since 1995, those numbers have plummeted. Palestinian gunmen seized Christian homes – compelling Israel to build a protective barrier between them and Jewish neighbourhoods – and then occupied the Church of the Nativity, looting it and using it as a latrine. Today, Christians comprise a mere one-fifth of their holy city's population."

In writing about the distressing plight of Mideast Christians, Oren echoes an alarm sounded recently by many observers and experts. In the February 2012 edition of Commentary, former foreign correspondent for Time and currently professor of history at Patrick Henry College, David Aikman, writes about the worldwide persecution of Christians, specifically emphasizing the Christian communities of China. His description, however, of the persecution of Christians in Saudi Arabia and Iran are quite horrifying.

Aikman laments the failure of western governments "to come to terms with its responsibilities in the protection of these people [persecuted Christian communities]." And he condemns U.S. President Barack Obama for failing to hold accountable "offending regimes."

Oren pointedly characterizes the plight of the Christians in the Middle East as "the extinction of the Middle East's Christian communities" and describes it as "an injustice of historic magnitude."

Only one country in the Middle East, he reminds readers – Israel – promises to protect the Christians within its midst and guarantee equal rights of worship and access to all Christian holy places.

That the Jewish state does so imperfectly, he emphasizes, does not abate in the slightest way the country's commitment enshrined in its Declaration of Independence to "ensure the complete equality of all its citizens irrespective of religion."

It is an ironic yet humanity-affirming irony of history that it is the Jews in 2012 who are at the forefront saving Christians.

Voter fraud alleged in Toronto riding

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Elections Canada may or may not be investigating reports of alleged voter fraud in the riding of Eglinton-Lawrence during the 2011 federal election.

A March 7 CBC News report unearthed evidence that some 2,700 unregistered voters got on the voters' list in the riding – won by Conservative Party candidate Joe Oliver, who defeated longtime Liberal MP Joe Volpe – by providing either false addresses or no addresses on their voting cards, which is in violation of Elections Canada rules.

Oliver won the riding by more than 4,000 votes.

Diane Benson, a spokesperson for Elections Canada, told The CJN said it's policy to "not deny nor confirm" whether her agency is investigating the allegations.

Oliver told reporters last week he would co-operate with Elections Canada if it decides to launch an investigation, but said he had not been contacted by the federal elections body.

Marianna Gagliardo, a constituency assistant at Oliver's riding office, said she was aware of the allegations but as of last Friday, had not been contacted by Elections Canada about the matter.

Meanwhile, Volpe has referred all questions on the subject to his lawyer, Tony Pascale.

Neither Volpe nor Pascale could be reached for comment, but Pascale told CBC last week that he wanted Elections Canada to investigate, because there were "an inordinately high number of voters registering who were not on the voters list in order to cast ballots."

Volpe had held Eglinton-Lawrence for the Liberals since 1988.

According to the 2006 census, the riding has a population of about 110,000, 39 per cent of whom were immigrants. About 17 per cent were Jewish and 11 per cent Italian.

If we teach today's students as we taught yesterday's, we rob them of tomorrow.

Panelists discuss ways to support Israel

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

A panel of three community leaders discussed Zionism and Israel at Temple Sinai recently.

More than 50 people attended the March 5 event to hear the panellists' views on the topic, "Wherever We Stand, We Stand with Israel: Exploring Pathways to Support Israel."

Rabbi Michael Dolgin

Temple Sinai's Rabbi Michael Dolgin, who moderated the discussion, said that the panel was particularly timely, as Israeli Apartheid Week was taking place on many university campuses and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had recently visited Ottawa.

"What better time to have these three people here to give different windows on how to support Israel," he said.

The panel included Paul Michaels, director of research and media relations for the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA); Jay Brodbar, executive director of the New Israel Fund (NIF) of Canada, and Anita Bromberg, national director of legal affairs for B'nai Brith.

CIJA is the "advocacy arm of the federations," said Michaels, and helps strengthen the Canadian-Israeli relationship through political and cultural missions to Israel, seminars on the Middle East and speaking out against boycott campaigns.

NIF Canada deals primarily with Israel's internal challenges, such as the growing gap between the rich and the poor, religious pluralism and tolerance. The fund does this by supporting Israeli NGOs that strengthen civil and human rights.

B'nai Brith, Bromberg said, represents the interests of the Jewish community to governments and NGOs.

Rabbi Dolgin asked the panellists what each organization does to strengthen the Zionist cause.

Bromberg said that "B'nai Brith is working hard to remind the community that the Zionist dream is alive and well."

Brodbar said NIF strengthens the "Zionist cause in a complementary way – by supporting Israelis."

Bromberg, however, criticized NIF Canada for what she called its "wavering support of Israel."

Brodbar replied that "sometimes we confuse strength with rigidity," maintaining that "things are not black and white, but you have to have some flexibility that others may see as wavering [support]."

Paul Michaels

Bromberg also criticized NIF Canada for funding Arab NGOs and for supporting the Goldstone report, which accused Israeli forces of war crimes during the Gaza war.

Brodbar defended his organization, saying that "the New Israel Fund of Canada should not apologize for what we do. Twenty per cent of Israeli citizens are Arabs, and they experience systemic discrimination.

"We work with Israeli NGOs to address these inequalities, so they don't have to turn to Muslim extremism," he added.

Brodbar said that internal challenges, such as social inequalities, must be resolved for Israel to be strong enough to deal with external threats.

"Eighty-four per cent of Israelis were supportive of the summer demonstrations, which called for more equality in Israeli society," he said, proving that these internal issues must be dealt with before they are exacerbated.

Michaels spoke about the rising challenges in supporting Israel. "The biggest challenge facing CIJA right now is the mounting campaign to delegitimize Israel – this new form of antisemitism," he said.

Brodbar stressed the need to protect Israel's young democracy. "No one is saying Israel doesn't have external pressures, but what we're saying is those aren't the only pressures, and if you care about Israel being a democratic, Israeli state, you have to also deal with the internal pressures," he said.

"We may have disagreements on the means of accomplishing our goals, but not on our love and support for Israel."

UJA goes SMASH to help underprivileged kids

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Comedian Martin Short hosted the first annual SMASH celebrity ping-pong tournament, a United Jewish Appeal fundraiser that raised more than $100,000 to send underprivileged children to summer camp.

"I love ping-pong. UJA is an amazing cause, and there is nothing nobler than helping kids enjoy a summer camp experience," Short said at the March 1 event at a nightclub in downtown Toronto.

"I went to Camp Wanakita in Haliburton, Ont., and when I wasn't at camp, I spent my time in cottage country. I have great memories of camp, and that is why I am here to give countless Jewish children that experience, too."

Jay Silber and Julie Albert United Jewish Appeal co-chairs with host Martin Short [Susan Minuk photo]

Comedian Carla Collins, one of many celebrities and professional athletes at the event produced by Solutions with Impact, said, "I am from Sault St. Marie, Northern Ontario, so I grew up on a lot of ping-pong.

"There are three things I always support for charity events: children, women and dogs. When [Solutions with Impact president] Joel Hock, approached me, I was happy to fly in to Toronto from Los Angeles."

Some 300 people attended the fundraiser. The ping-pong tournament consisted of 26 teams of three people each, playing four doubles matches over the course of approximately four hours, including a championship game with the highest fundraising teams. The top 10 highest fundraising teams played with a celebrity teammate.

Team Frodismash, comprising Dani Frodis, Jeff Stal and Jacob Zaidenberg, who raised $8,564.37, won the tournament. Their celebrity player was former Toronto Maple Leaf captain, Wendel Clark.

Throughout the evening, music flowed and the energy escalated. Ping-pong balls flew in midair as the crowd, watching displays of skill, screamed and applauded their teams, while sipping cocktails, drinking beer and sampling hors d'oeuvres. Guests also bid on items in both silent and live auctions.

Julie Albert, who co-chaired the event with Jay Silber, said, "The fact that both of us are ardent ping-pong enthusiasts didn't hurt, but, more than that, it was all about raising money to help send underprivileged Jewish kids to summer camp, an experience so many of us take for granted and so many of us have benefited from."

Dan Horowitz, editorial director of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said it was "great to see so many members of Jewish Toronto – of all backgrounds and ages – come together to have a great time, shmooze, and, of course, play some serious ping-pong, all to support this event which is all about helping to build and strengthen Jewish identity among our next generation by helping them experience Jewish summer camp.

"I hear from so many people today that Jewish summer camp was their bridge, their connection, to Jewish life, where they made lasting friendships, and great memories," he added.

John Salley, former NBA player and current broadcaster, said that "you strengthen people... by helping those who are not as [fortunate] as you may be or think you are."

Actor William Baldwin said, "First and foremost, the organization UJA brought me here to assist kids to attend summer camp. A very interesting concept – speaking as one who was a poor Irish kid who never went away to camp in his entire life."

Les Dukes, an information technology consultant, said, "I am an avid player. I even brought my own paddle and have been working very hard practising to get ready and prepare for the tournament.

"It is awesome to see the celebrity support tonight, to be able to raise money for kids to have a summer at camp, an experience they may not have been able to enjoy."

Also attending the fundraiser were actor Ellen Dubin, former Leafs and Calgary Flames player Gary Leeman, actor Kiowa Gordon and Toronto Raptor Amir Johnson. Singer Chantal Kreviazuk wowed the audience with her performance at the event.

Déjà vu of sorrow and suffering

Palestinian terrorists are once again firing rockets into southern Israel.

As of this writing on March 12, over a four-day period beginning last Friday, they had sent some 110 rockets into civilian-populated areas of the south. The terrorists had actually launched 150 rockets, but 40 of them landed inside Gaza.

Due to technical failures Sunday in Israel's Iron Dome missile interception system, two Grad rockets struck Be'er Sheva. One smashed into a school that was, thankfully, empty at the time due to the cancellation of all classes. The other struck a parked car in a residential neighborhood. No one one was killed. Eight people were wounded, one severely. Some 15 houses suffered major damage. Despite the failure to intercept the Be'er Sheva'bound rockets, the Iron Dome had intercepted and obliterated 40 rockets by Sunday night. More than 90 rockets had crashed in Israeli territory during that time, but the Iron Dome is intended to bring down only those rockets identified as heading toward populated areas.

And Israel, appropriately, retaliated.

JTA reported Sunday night that the Israeli Air Force had struck 21 targets in Gaza, including 13 air strikes to halt rocket-launching attempts and eight attacks against weapons factories and storage sites. Some 18 Palestinians, including a 14-year-old, have been killed by the air force attacks. The terrorists launched their latest barrage in retaliation, they said, for the targeted killing by Israel of Zuhir al-Qaisi, the leader of Popular Resistance Committee (PRC). Qaisi was said to be planning a potentially catastrophic terror attack on Israel's southern border. He was also the mastermind behind the attack last year near Eilat that killed eight Israelis.

The self-righteous, indignant finger-pointing at Israel accompanied by shouts of disproportionality have already sounded from many rostrums. Israel was right to pre-empt the impending Qa'isi planned terror incident.

The plain, irreducible truth of the matter is that the terror groups that operate in Gaza such as the PRC and Islamic Jihad – in addition of course to the Hamas Gaza government – take their cue from the ruling Hamas chiefs. Indeed, Hamas could shut them down at will were it their will to do so.

It has been seven years since Israel withdrew entirely from Gaza. No Israeli soldier or civilian is to be found there. And yet, the Hamas rulers have directed their people to commit themselves to only one national project: the destruction of their Jewish neighbour. It is likely that more rockets will fall in Israel over the coming days and that Israel will respond with its far more accurate, deadly force.

This is what the Palestinian leaders have brought and continue to bring to their people, a disheartening drama, déjà vu, of sorrow, suffering and despair.

Withholding support to universities

When I received the annual call for pledges to continue to support three Canadian universities, I had this to say: "I will resume my support when I see the development of a policy ensuring that your university will no longer hide behind free speech in order to allow propaganda against the State of Israel and intimidation of Jewish students."

Marriages at the temple

In the article "New Montreal rabbi hopes to 'open doors'" (March 8), on the hiring of Reform Rabbi Lisa Grushcow at Montreal's Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, Janice Arnold writes that the temple allows same-sex and interfaith marriages to be performed there, if there is a commitment to create a Jewish home. The Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR), the Reform movement's rabbinical association in North America, has consistently opposed interfaith marriage (intermarriage). In their journal American Reform Responsa (Vol. XC, 1980) on the topic Reform Judaism and Mixed Marriage, they quote a resolution passed in Atlanta in 1973 that reads: "The Central Conference of American Rabbis recalling its stand in 1909 that mixed marriage is contrary to Jewish tradition and should be discouraged, now declares its opposition to participation by its members in any ceremony which solemnizes a mixed marriage."

In performing interfaith marriages, Temple Emanu-El goes against the Reform movement's own stance on this issue. In a National Jewish Population Survey in 2000, by Antony Gordon and Richard Horowitz, it was shown that 53 per cent of young Jews belonging to the Reform movement marry out. With such an attitude toward intermarriage, is it any wonder?

Torah egalitarianism

Regarding the article "Beth Tikvah implements Torah egalitarianism" (Feb. 16), to be precise, Beth Tikvah Synagogue has marked Shabbat morning bnot mitzvah during the Torah service since the congregation's inception. A bat mitzvah chanted the Haftorah and its accompanying blessings but did not receive an aliyah. Her father received the Maftir Aliyah at the Torah. Secondly, with kudos to Betty Rumberg, the first non-bat mitzvah adult woman to receive an aliyah at the Torah at Beth Tikvah was Gail Sandler, following the promise of a woman receiving an aliyah at the Torah on a donation dare from the rabbi during the Yom Kippur War. The promise was fulfilled.

Remembering the Struma

On Feb. 24, Romania paid homage to the 768 Romanian Jews who lost their lives 70 years ago trying to escape war-torn Europe for British-mandated Palestine on board the ill-fated SS Struma, which was sunk by a Soviet submarine in the Black Sea. However, Romania still has far to go to atone for its crimes against humanity during that dark period of our history. During World War II, the pro-Nazi, fascist and antisemitic regime of Marshal Ion Antonescu was directly involved in the murder of as many as 400,000 innocent Jewish men, women and children in Romania and throughout Ukraine and Moldova. Romania has yet to officially acknowledge, apologize and/or offer reparations of any kind for its past heinous and barbaric behaviour toward the Jewish People. Perhaps, it's about time that it did.

Old Toronto

I read Ellen Weiser's article "Memories of old Toronto" with a smile on my face (March 8, cjnews.com). Taking a walk down gastro memory lane warmed my heart. I lived just north of Wilson and Bathurst, so we didn't share all the same eating experiences, but my favourite by far was Basil's Restaurant. Every Sunday night, my dad would drive down Avenue Road to University Avenue, turn left on to Gerrard Street, and always find a free parking spot, and I do mean free. We would patiently wait in the line until the maitre d' called the infamous "party of four" before we were seated in the best booths in the city. My meal was always the hamburger special, with chocolate cream pie for dessert. Weiser was right on with the rice pudding for the parents. Thanks for bringing back this wonderful memory for a native Torontonian.

Following are excerpts from an address by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) Policy Conference on March 5.

Tonight, I'd like to talk to you about a subject that no one has been talking about recently: Iran. Every day, I open the newspapers and read about these red lines and these timelines. I read about what Israel has supposedly decided to do, or what Israel might do.

Well, I'm not going to talk to you about what Israel will do or will not do. I never talk about that. But I do want to talk to you about the dangers of a nuclear-armed Iran. I want to explain why Iran must never be allowed to develop nuclear weapons.

President [Barack] Obama has reiterated his commitment to prevent that from happening. He stated clearly that all options are on the table, and that American policy is not containment.

Well, Israel has exactly the same policy. We are determined to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons. We leave all options on the table, and containment is definitely not an option. The Jewish state will not allow those who seek our destruction to possess the means to achieve that goal. A nuclear-armed Iran must be stopped.

Amazingly, some people refuse to acknowledge that Iran's goal is to develop nuclear weapons. You see, Iran claims to do everything it's doing, that it's enriching uranium to develop medical isotopes. Yeah, that's right. A country that builds underground nuclear facilities, develops intercontinental ballistic missiles [ICBM], manufactures thousands of centrifuges and that absorbs crippling sanctions is doing all that in order to advance... medical research. So you see, when that Iranian ICBM is flying through the air to a location near you, you've got nothing to worry about. It's only carrying medical isotopes...

Fortunately, President Obama and most world leaders understand that the claim that Iran's goal is not to develop nuclear weapons is simply ridiculous.

Yet incredibly, some are prepared to accept an idea only slightly less preposterous: that we should accept a world in which the ayatollahs have atomic bombs. Sure, they say, Iran is cruel, but it's not crazy. It's detestable but it's deterrable.

Responsible leaders should not bet the security of their countries on the belief that the world's most dangerous regimes won't use the world's most dangerous weapons. And I promise you that as prime minister, I will never gamble with the security of the State of Israel.

From the beginning, the ayatollah regime has broken every international rule and flouted every norm. It has seized embassies, targeted diplomats. It sends its own children through minefields; it hangs gays and stones women; it supports [President Bashar] Assad's brutal slaughter of the Syrian people; it is the world's foremost sponsor of terrorism. It sponsors Hezbollah in Lebanon, Hamas in Gaza and terrorists throughout the Middle East, Africa, even South America. Iran's proxies have dispatched hundreds of suicide bombers, planted thousands of roadside bombs, and they fired over 20,000 missiles at civilians.

Through terror from the skies and terror on the ground, Iran is responsible for the murder of hundreds, if not thousands, of Americans. In 1983, Iran's proxy Hezbollah blew up the Marine barracks in Lebanon, killing 240 U.S. Marines. In the last decade, it's been responsible for murdering and maiming American soldiers in Afghanistan and in Iraq. Just a few months ago, it tried to assassinate the Saudi Ambassador to the United States in a restaurant just a few blocks from here. The assassins didn't care that several senators and congressmen would have been murdered in the process.

Now this is real chutzpah: Iran accuses the American government of orchestrating 9-11, and that's as brazen as denying the Holocaust, and they do. Iran calls for Israel's destruction, and they work for its destruction – each day, every day, relentlessly.

I say all his to make one point clear – this is how Iran behaves today, without nuclear weapons. Think of how they will behave tomorrow, with nuclear weapons. Iran will be even more reckless and a lot more dangerous. There's been plenty of talk recently about the costs of stopping Iran. I think it's time we started talking about the costs of not stopping Iran. A nuclear-armed Iran would dramatically increase terrorism by giving terrorists a nuclear umbrella. Let me try to explain what that means, a nuclear umbrella. It means that Iran's terror proxies like Hezbollah [and] Hamas will be emboldened to attack the United States, Israel and other countries because they will be backed by a power that has atomic bombs. So the terrorism could grow tenfold.

A nuclear-armed Iran could choke off the world's oil supply and could make real its threat to close the Straits of Hormouz. If you're worried about the price of oil today, imagine how high oil prices could get once a nuclear-armed Iran starts blackmailing the world.

If Iran gets nuclear weapons, it would set off a mad dash by Saudi Arabia, Turkey and others to acquire nuclear weapons of their own. The world's most volatile region would become a nuclear tinderbox waiting to go off. And here's the worst nightmare of all, with nuclear weapons, Iran could threaten all of us with nuclear terrorism. It could put a nuclear device in a ship heading to any port or in a truck parked in any city, anywhere in the world.

I want you to think about what it would mean to have nuclear weapons in the hands of those who lead millions of radicals in chants of "Death to America" and "Death to Israel."

When you think about that, you'll reach a simple conclusion: for the sake of our prosperity, for the sake of our security, for the sake of our children, Iran must not be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons!

Of course, the best outcome would be if Iran decided to abandon its nuclear weapons program peacefully. No one would be happier than I and the people of Israel if Iran dismantled its program. But so far, that hasn't happened. For 15 years, I've been warning that a nuclear-armed Iran is a grave danger to my country and to the peace and security of the entire world.

For the last decade, the international community has tried diplomacy. It hasn't worked. For six years, the international community has applied sanctions. That hasn't worked, either.

I appreciate President Obama's recent efforts to impose even tougher sanctions against Iran. These sanctions are hurting Iran's economy, but unfortunately, Iran's nuclear program continues to march forward.

Israel has waited patiently for the international community to resolve this issue. We've waited for diplomacy to work. We've waited for sanctions to work. None of us can afford to wait much longer. As prime minister of Israel, I will never let my people live in the shadow of annihilation.

Some commentators would have you believe that stopping Iran from getting the bomb is more dangerous than letting Iran have the bomb. They say that a military confrontation with Iran would undermine the efforts already underway; that it would be ineffective; and that it would provoke an even more vindictive response by Iran. I've heard these arguments before. In fact, I've read them before. In my desk, I have copies of an exchange of letters between the World Jewish Congress and the United States War Department.

Here are the letters: the year was 1944. The World Jewish Congress implored the American government to bomb Auschwitz. The reply came five days later. I want to read it to you.

"Such an operation could be executed only by diverting considerable air support essential to the success of our forces elsewhere... and in any case, it would be of such doubtful efficacy that it would not warrant the use of our resources..."

And, my friends, here's the most remarkable sentence of all, and I quote: "Such an effort might provoke even more vindictive action by the Germans." Think about that. "Even more vindictive action" – than the Holocaust.

2012 is not 1944. The American government today is different. You heard it in President Obama's speech...

But here's my point: the Jewish People are also different. Today we have a state of our own. And the purpose of the Jewish state is to defend Jewish lives and to secure the Jewish future. Never again will we not be masters of the fate of our very survival. Never again. That is why Israel must always have the ability to defend itself, by itself, against any threat.

We deeply appreciate the great alliance between our two countries. But when it comes to Israel's survival, we must always remain the masters of our fate.

We must help the Syrian people

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

From 2004 to 2006, I was partner to secret and informal contacts with representatives of the Syrian regime, with the aim of examining the possibility of reaching a peace agreement. During the talks, which were held alternately under Turkish and Swiss sponsorship, a not-surprising argument developed.

The Israeli participants requested a Syrian gesture that would show them that there had been a change of heart, but Syrian President Bashar Assad replied (via his emissaries): "I'll smile at you after I get back the Golan." Later on, the talks became more formal, but ultimately collapsed, as will be remembered, in January 2009, in the wake of Operation Cast Lead in the Gaza Strip.

Alon Liel

So, it is possible to inform you officially now, Mr. Assad, that you will not get the Golan, even if you suddenly begin to smile at us all the time. After the monstrous teeth you have bared in the past year, you can forget about us – both the left and the right. If at any time we choose to speak with Syria about the future of the Golan Heights (and I believe this will happen), it will not be with you, nor with any regime that resembles the one you are still heading at this time.

It is no simple matter for me – as someone who exactly five years ago set up the Israel-Syria Peace Society, and still heads it – to write these words. But I am convinced Assad has lost his legitimacy as a ruler and, therefore, also the right to demand the Golan back at any time. This will be the case even if he succeeds to remain in power.

Looking at this issue from a broader perspective, it is difficult today for Israel to make any kind of substantive move during the Syrian crisis, and that is a shame. In recent years, our government decided to make do with strengthening its ties with the western world, and especially with eastern Europe, and it has neglected attempts to strengthen our legitimacy in the Middle East. The severe decline in relations with Turkey is a salient example of the damage that has been caused.

And so it is that when a mere few dozen kilometres from our border a horrific civil war is taking place, we have become so paralyzed out of fear that if we intervene on behalf of one side or another, we shall wreak political havoc upon it and undermine its image.

It is precisely we, who are so close geographically, so strong militarily and so shocked at the killing taking place at the very threshold of our home, who are prevented from acting. Those who could take action – the western world, and particularly the Americans – are geographically removed. They are tired of the wars of the past decade, and are busy with economic tribulations (Europe) or frozen by domestic politics (the United States).

Israelis recently demonstrated outside the Russian embassy in Tel Aviv to protest Moscow's defense of the Assad regime. [Flash90 photo]

Other than expressing deep sorrow over the thousands of dead in the war in Syria, and accusing Assad of the killings, we are left now only with the possibility of acting on a humanitarian level. It is incumbent upon the Israeli government, assisted by civil society, to get prepared, and without delay, for the possibility of absorbing Syrian citizens in the Golan Heights, and providing medical or humanitarian assistance to any Syrian citizen who needs it.

In this scenario, we cannot lose. If the outstretched hand comes in contact with a cold shoulder on the part of the Syrian population, we have at least demonstrated our goodwill. And if, surprisingly, Syrian citizens do agree to come to the Golan in order to find refuge, perhaps we will be able to change the tenor of our relationship with the Syrian people over the generations.

Alon Liel served as director general of the Foreign Ministry, and teaches at Tel Aviv University and the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya.

How about Arab apartheid week?

In Syria, one of the Middle East's most oppressive regimes (after the fall of the Ghadhafi clan in Libya) has killed thousands of its citizens, but university campuses in North America and Europe are silent.

There are no demonstrations, no moral outrage, no conferences and no boycott campaigns. There is also no "Saudi apartheid week," no protests against the killings of members of the Coptic community in Egypt, and no boycott of Turkey for systematic discrimination against its Kurdish citizens, or of Iran for systematic attacks against non-Shiite minorities.

Instead, the self-proclaimed voices of liberalism, progressivism and peace are using all of their energies and resources for an obsessive attack against Israel with another round of "Israeli apartheid week." The use of the "apartheid" libel is inherently racist and discriminatory, targeting the existence of Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish people. The political warfare accompanied by boycott, divestment and sanctions campaigns is a direct continuation of the Arab rejection of the November 1947 UN Partition Plan. This strategy was also embodied in the infamous 1975 UN "Zionism is racism" resolution. In the words of Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, "Let there be no mistake about it: to indict Israel as an apartheid state is prologue and justification for the dismantling of the Jewish state, for the criminalization of its supporters, and for the consequential silencing of their speech."

This campaign immorally exploits the suffering of the real victims of apartheid and racism, and transforms a political dispute into a racial conflict. The comparison was categorically rejected and denounced by Judge Richard Goldstone in the New York Times. Goldstone, a former justice of the South African Constitutional Court, wrote that, "In Israel, there is no apartheid. Nothing there comes close to the definition of apartheid under the 1998 Rome Statute." Goldstone added that "while 'apartheid' can have broader meaning, its use is meant to evoke the situation in pre-1994 South Africa. It is an unfair and inaccurate slander against Israel, calculated to retard rather than advance peace negotiations."

Many others who had experienced the real apartheid expressed similar views. Benjamin Pogrund, who was a journalist in South Africa, wrote "Use of the apartheid label is at best ignorant and naive and at worst cynical and manipulative."

The reality is that Israel's Arab citizens own property, have full voting rights, are proportionately represented in the Knesset, and are appointed to the High Court of Justice. Arab and Jewish patients receive identical medical treatment, and while there is room for improvement in the distribution of income, the differences in Israel are not simply due to ethno-religious distinctions.

Gerald Steinberg

in Jerusalem

In the face of these blatant double standards, the power of the "apartheid" campaign is derived from the resources that are available, in both political and financial forms. Politically, as noted, this divisive agenda is supported by the Arab and Islamic blocs at the United Nations and its associated institutions, providing numerous platforms, as well as access to the media.

Financially, the availability of significant European government funding for ostensible human rights organizations that actively promote the "apartheid" libel is a major factor, including Adalah, Badil, Al Haq, and Al Mezan. Similarly, Electronic Intifada, which is indirectly funded through Dutch government humanitarian aid, plays a central role in this political warfare, as do various Palestinian solidarity committees, whose funding sources are entirely hidden.

If the officials of these governments and of the groups they support under the banners of human rights and democracy actually took these principles seriously, they would use their resources to protest the real oppression of the Arab and Iranian dictatorships. Similarly, if students and faculty on university campuses who preside over the attacks on Israel were sincerely concerned about morality, they would be leading protests against these abuses. Their silence speaks volumes about the double standards and cynicism that has captured and distorted the moral agenda beyond recognition.

Obama hardens his position on Iran

Amid escalating speculation that Israel was on the cusp of launching a pre-emptive attack on Iran's nuclear facilities, President Barack Obama of the United States and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel met in Washington, D.C., on March 5 to discuss that contentious issue

With Israel having declared its implacable opposition to a nuclear-armed Iran, the debate over Iran's capabilities and intentions has grown exponentially.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Indeed, Iran's quest for a nuclear arsenal has supplanted the Arab-Israeli conflict as the overriding problem facing the two allies and has become a test of Israel's strategic relationship with the United States.

And in a year when Obama is seeking a second term in the White House and his Republican rivals are falsely accusing him of being soft on the Iranian regime, Iran has pushed aside all other issues in Israel's dialogue with the United States.

Netanyahu, who has described Iran as an existential threat, arrived in Washington after talks with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper in Ottawa.

In a preview of his message to Obama, Netanyahu demanded that Iran must abide by certain conditions before renewed international talks on its nuclear program get under way. Saying that Iran's leadership is cynically playing for time to deceive the world, Netanyahu insisted that negotiations should resume only after Iran ends its nuclear activities. Netanyahu called on Iran to stop the enrichment of uranium, dispose of its current stock of enriched uranium and dismantle an underground facility in Qom.

Rejecting Netanyahu's ultimatum, Obama said that Iran would never agree to it. The following day, the United States, Russia, China, Germany, France and Britain announced they had accepted Iran's offer to launch a fresh round of discussions. These negotiations are expected to begin in April.

Prior to this announcement, the International Atomic Energy Agency expressed "serious concerns" about the possible military dimensions of Iran's atomic program and disclosed that Iran has tripled its production of higher-grade enriched uranium.

Of added concern to Israel was the news that in last week's Iranian parliamentary elections, the majority of seats were won by candidates loyal to Ayatollah Ali Khameini, Iran's hardline supreme leader, who has branded Israel a malignant "cancer" that must be excised from the Middle East.

Netanyahu's meeting with Obama – the ninth and arguably the most important one in three years – occurred after a series of high-level Israeli-U.S. consultations on Iran took place.

To ascertain how the Obama administration might react to an Israeli strike, Israel sent three senior officials to Washington: Tamir Pardo, the director of the Mossad; Ehud Barak, the defence minister, and Moshe Yaalon, the vice-premier.

Obama dispatched three envoys to Jerusalem: Defence Secretary Leon Panetta, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Martin Dempsey and National Security Adviser Tom Donilon.

Upon returning home, Panetta was reported to have said that an Israeli attack would most likely occur this coming spring. Dempsey, meanwhile, warned that a strike would "not be prudent at this point" and could destabilize the region. These comments were obviously designed to discourage Israel from taking action.

Donilon kept his opinions to himself. But shortly after his visit, the New York Times published an intriguing op-ed piece by Israel's former chief of military intelligence, Amos Yadlin, on this highly charged topic.

Yadlin pointed out that Israel's "military ingenuity" should not be underestimated, argued that a non-nuclear Iran was "the best guarantee" for long-term Mideast stability, and stated that Israel needed "iron-clad" assurances from the Obama administration to induce it to exercise restraint.

Yadlin's article, which was probably part of an orchestrated Israeli plan to convince the United States to harden its policy on Iran, ran alongside a flurry of stories suggesting that time was running out on diplomacy, that Israel was seeking a clear answer from Washington concerning its "red lines" on Iran's nuclear program, and that Israel had ceased sharing its plans on Iran with the United States. Still other articles left the impression that the Obama administration was "buying time" and that Washington disagreed with Israel's assessment that economic sanctions against Iran had been or would be ineffective.

With tension rising, Obama tried to cool passions by saying that Israel had not yet decided whether to act militarily, that he was not "bluffing" about attacking Iran if it built a nuclear weapon, and that he was committed to preserving Israel's qualitative military edge.

In a bid to stiffen Netanyahu's resolve on the eve of his discussions with Obama, Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said that Israel would act in its own best interests and would not be influenced by outside powers.

U.S. President Barack Obama

To no one's surprise, Obama urged Netanyahu to give diplomacy a chance, requested restraint from Israel, spoke of the dire regional consequences of a strike on Iran and warned that "too much loose talk of war" only benefited Iran by driving up oil prices and creating a measure of sympathy for Iran in Muslim lands.

Yet, in a significant hardening of his position, Obama said, "My policy here is not going to be one of containment. My policy is prevention of Iran obtaining nuclear weapons."

Obama also pleased Netanyahu by observing that Iran is as much an American issue as an Israeli one, and that Israel has the sovereign right to make its own decisions on national security.

Netanyahu, who has used Holocaust imagery to describe Israel's bitter confrontation with Iran, laid down markers as well, saying that Israel "must always have the ability to defend itself, by itself," and that Israel will always be "the master of its fate."

Although Netanyahu claimed that neither diplomacy nor sanctions would nudge Iran to abandon its nuclear program, he acknowledged that he has not made a decision on striking Iran.

In the wake of Netanyahu's visit, it remains to be seen what Obama's response would be should Israel resort to force in the future.

Obama, who inherited unpopular wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and is loath to make new military commitments in an era of economic uncertainty, is certainly not the first U.S. president who prefers diplomacy over war.

Obama's hawkish predecessor, George W. Bush, one of the most pro-Israel presidents in history, rejected an Israeli request for refuelling aircraft and bunker-busting bombs to attack Iran.

To compensate Israel, Bush bolstered Israel's ballistic missile defences and stationed an advanced radar station in the Negev Desert.

Like Bush, Obama has upgraded defence relations with Israel. Last week, Israeli President Shimon Peres noted that Israel and the United States have never had better security cooperation.

In telltale signs that Israel and the United States are co-ordinating their respective positions on Iran, Israel announced that its chief of staff, Gen. Benny Gantz, is due to visit Washington later this month for consultations, and Obama instructed Panetta to consider an Israeli request for upgraded bunker-piercing bombs.

Trainees to learn counter-surveillance methods

One way the community security network can help police is by accurately reporting details to investigators about crimes or suspicious activities, he said.

"If we have individuals who are trained on how to take the proper description of a person, or how to get involved in thorough, professional response to [police] queries, that helps law enforcement help us," Horowitz said.

Trainees will learn about counter-surveillance methods, as well how to conduct proper patrols and how to recognize signs of suspicious activity, Horowitz said.

"We're not training individuals on how to engage. We're training them how to react, think objectively, keep a distance and stay out of harm's way in order to protect the members of the community."

He said this last point differentiates the community security network from more militant organizations that either verbally or physically engage "hostile individuals."

Some people might want to volunteer for his group because of personal ideology, but anyone who is motivated by "extreme or radical thinking" will be rejected, he said.

Horowitz said an applicant who has a vigilante attitude, is aggressive or is looking to instigate fights won't pass his screening process, which will involve medical and background checks.

Asked why this initiative is being undertaken now, he said the current anti-Israel climate means it's "more likely than not" that threats will increase against Jewish communities and now is a "good time to prepare."

But he added that "the Jewish community has, is and will always be under a certain amount of threat. What's important is for us to focus less on the intention of our enemies and more on what we should do to establish a [security] standard that will allow us to operate and fluctuate based on the threat."

Horowitz said Canada and Canadian Jews aren't the prime targets for terrorists, but they're relatively high on the list.

"Europe, Africa and South America are more attractive for logistical and political reasons. But Canada, given that nothing has happened here and we're in a liberal society, for better or worse, lends itself to be attractive to those who wish to cause harm," he said.

"Radical militant Islam is active here. Canadian authorities are going to have to learn to deal with radical Islam, and I think they are starting to learn. But understanding something and doing something about it are two different things."

Horowitz said he'll consider all applicants, regardless of religious or organizational affiliation. As long the person is "Jewish, cares, is capable and is a rational thinker, I'll train you."

Survivors are models of tolerance, panel told

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Holocaust survivors have become her role models, says social worker Paula David.

"I am totally committed to looking at the flip side of terrorism, oppression and pain, and learning what comes out the other side," said David, a gerontologist at the Institute for Life Course and Aging at the University of Toronto and a lecturer at the school's Factor-Inwentash Faculty of Social Work.

David, who previously worked at Baycrest, where she was co-ordinator of the Holocaust resource program, spoke last week at an International Women's Day panel held at Toronto City Hall. It was sponsored by the Azrieli Foundation Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program and the Woman Abuse Council of Toronto.

Also speaking was Renate Krakauer, who along with her father, William Tannenzapf, wrote a memoir for the Azrieli Foundation titled Memories from the Abyss: But I Had A Happy Childhood.

Naomi Azrieli, chair of the Azrieli Foundation, said Holocaust survivors are now in their 80s and 90s, "and we are only beginning to see how women's experiences have differed from men's.

"We need to see how the suppression of emotional and physical needs results in long-term effects, [which] have repercussions for families and relationships into the future," she said.

David said that it takes a "madman to imagine what Hitler did to people. This [started me thinking] about resilience – how we turn can something around and come out a little better. We can't change the past, but we can get up again."

She said that one of her clients at Baycrest once told her that Hitler had turned her heart to ice. "There will always be a piece of ice, and it will never be OK again, but how you live with that is how the resilience factor comes in."

Her theory about resilience, though, is that, like muscle tone, it gets weaker as people age. "I believe that at 85, we are not as resilient as we are at 40. When we have a smaller group of people around us, the impact of one of them leaving is greater."

Studies on post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) have been mostly about men, she said, because men have historically served as soldiers. "PTSD became a diagnosis in 1980, but [if these studies] are looking at soldiers, where does that leave the women?" David asked.

There are results of war that aren't physical, she said, and women are humiliated in different ways than men. "People don't recover from PTSD. They learn to live with it. They learn to build back their self-esteem, " she added.

She said she learned from elderly Holocaust survivors the importance of protecting their stories. "It is important for them to tell stories of who they are, but some [stories] are very private. It takes a lot of resilience and strength to tell a painful story."

Krakauer, who survived the war as an infant, said that she was her mother's motivation to survive. "Her primary thought was for her child."

She learned from her parents, she said, not to talk about what the family went through, "or they would think we were crazy. [They think] people can't survive that and come out OK. They can come out OK, though."

Her father despaired when he couldn't carry out his role as a provider for the family, she said. "Until he was established in a new country, it was very difficult for him. My mother, however, saw her role as the most important – to save a child's life. That was her way of coping with PTSD."

Female leaders honoured on Women's Day

Carolyn Blackman

Penny Krowitz and Barbara Landau were honoured last week at a multifaith event commemorating International Women's Day.

The event was sponsored by the Women's Intercultural Network (WIN) in co-operation with the Noor Cultural Centre, the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, and Act to End Violence Against Women.

Krowitz, executive director of Act to End Violence Against Women, was awarded the International Women's Day Award for her commitment to raising awareness, and working to eliminate violence against women everywhere.

Landau, a lawyer and psychologist, was given the Vara P. Singh Award, which is presented to a woman whose years of volunteer contributions have enhanced the quality of life for women of all cultural backgrounds. She is co-chair of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims and a founding member of Together in Hope, a women's Arab-Jewish dialogue group.

The event, which was organized to raise awareness about the nature and extent of violence against women in Canada, began with a dramatic presentation called "Unspoken Words," which highlighted the faces and voices of abuse.

In her keynote address, which followed, Krowitz said violence against women can happen to anyone. "Abuse is an imbalance of power – physically, emotionally, sexually, financially or spiritually. It is damaging to the body and damaging to the soul, and the soul [can be] damaged forever.

"Emotional abuse erodes a woman's self-esteem, [but] some women do not recognize the behaviour as abuse, because they are not knowledgeable about it."

Krowitz said that we must continue to speak out against violence against women. "We must educate boys and girls about healthy relationships, and teach young women that they deserve to be treated with respect.

"We must break the cycle of violence, so in the future, there can be a true celebration of International Women's Day."

Social worker Mubarka Alam, who has worked with abused women for more than 40 years, said they don't have to feel alone. "There are resources available."

She referred to 211, a directory of more than 20,000 community, social, health and government services. It can be accessed by dialing 211, or online at 211.ca.

Krowitz said the abuse of women is not really a women's issue. "It's a man's issue, because they abuse more than women."

Why we remember Amalek

Rabbi David Cadoch

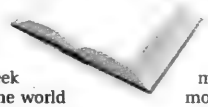
The Shabbat before the festival of Purim was Parshat Zachor, in which we are commanded to recite the maftir concerning Amalek. As it's written in Parshat Ki Tetze, "Remember what Amalek did unto you by the way as you came forth out of Egypt. How he met you by the way, and smote the hindmost of you, all that were enfeebled at your rear, when you were faint and weary; and he feared not God. Therefore it shall be, when the Lord thy God hath given you rest from all your enemies round about, in the land which the Lord thy God gives you for an inheritance to possess it, that you shall blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven; you shall not forget."

We are commanded to blot out the memory of Amalek, and yet we are told to remember this episode. It seems to me there are two points that seem contradictory to the spirit of Judaism: remembering what we must blot out is in fact bearing a grudge, and by blotting out we nurture the desire to hate. Is it appropriate to hate human beings who were made in the image of God?

We need to understand that the focal point of Judaism is the Exodus from Egypt, as we recite every Shabbat in the Kiddush. Once out of Egypt, the Jewish nation established its principal goal: a nation guided by the Almighty and destined to be a beacon of light unto the world. Therefore, the mitzvah to read and listen carefully on Shabbat Zachor (the Sabbath of Remembrance) is one that obligates the Jewish nation to remember why we were freed and what our goal in life is. To this end, we will always encounter obstacles and those who oppose the Almighty's will.

So who is Amalek? Amalek

Rabbinic Reflections



stands for all those that seek to destroy godliness in the world and annihilate the moral fibre of mankind, because they do not recognize or fear God. This darkness needs to be blotted out and its memory uprooted to make way for God's will on Earth. It is a public declaration of the Creator's existence and omnipresence. By remembering to blot out this dark force, we call to mind our duty and the duty of mankind to show kindness and justice to all, with the exception of Amalek, unless this nation does tshuvah. Bravery does not come from attacking the weak or feeble of a society, but by defending and protecting their cause and right to life as human beings.

Uprooting evil in our midst is a mitzvah, as tolerating it breeds hatred. We live in a world where martyrdom is worshipped on the altar of innocence. Parents teaching their children to hate and die for a cause is rooted in the distortion of truth and disrespect for life.

Empowering this kind of evil endangers every human being created in the image of God. When there is no reverence for life, there is no sanctity, and we become even more savage than the most dangerous creatures.

It's the duty of every human being to stand up and fight for the cause of justice and mercy and the respect of life. We the Jewish nation are the teachers of this mission, with this privilege comes tremendous responsibility and accountability.

Rabbi David Cadoch is spiritual leader for Shabbat and holidays at the Beth HaRambam Synagogue in Maimonides Hospital, Montreal.

Life and death

In Anglo-Saxon tradition, there is the story of a bewildered swallow that flies through an open window into a large brightly lit banquet hall – only to disappear through an open window on the other side.

This ancient story remains a faithful allegory of human life. Like the swallow, we enter the world out of the darkness of a primordial past, enjoy briefly life's light and beauty and then disappear into a dark eternity.

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

Many of my friends and colleagues are passing from the scene and more than ever death is something to be reckoned with. Eventually it will claim each of us. It's only a question of when and how.

Philosophers have held various views about death. Lucretius taught that non-existence after death is merely the mirror image of non-existence before birth. There is no reason to be more disturbed by the one than by the other. Socrates when sentenced to die by an Athenian court serenely drank the fatal cup of hemlock. Death, he assured his friends, is either a long dreamless slumber, or the migration of the soul from one realm to another. Either way, it is nothing to be feared. Despite his numerous problems, Spinoza declared, "A free man thinks least of all about death."

But it is not death alone and our unequal struggle against mortality that I consider. There is the inescapable fact that life compels us to let go of our youth. Inevitably, our muscles lose their flexibility, our reflexes are slowed and our physical strength and vitality are diminished.

The years pass, and where there was once a sense of eager anticipation, there is now some hesitancy in the face of tomorrow and a greater tendency to dwell upon yesterday with lingering regret. We pray for old age, but how reluctant we are to pay the price of our advancing years.

Life also has a way of compelling us to let go of our children. It has been said that the three things we can offer our children are dedication, education and abdication. Of the three, who will deny that the last mentioned duty is the most difficult to discharge.

And so in many vital areas, life sternly demands of us to renounce and relinquish. Loved ones die, youth fades and our children leave us.

We must surrender so much that is precious to us. But that should encourage us to enjoy these very things while they are still ours. Because we and those closest to us are mortal, we must love each other while we may and serve each other with added tenderness. Because life is of limited duration, ours is the task to make it of unlimited depth. Because as quantity is fixed, we should enrich its quality.

Youth fades. But let us not squander it recklessly, nor spend it in such a way as to bequeath a burden of guilt to our later years. "Well spent is our youth," our sages remind us, "if it does not embarrass our old age."

May God give us a heart of wisdom-the ability to transform the sorrow of bereavement, the passing of our years and the independence of our children into a triumph of the spirit.

Antisemitism in the academic voice

We've now had the eighth iteration of that ignominious week of campus events that accuses the State of Israel of apartheid practices. Year after year, shrill variations on the same ugly themes assault our senses, undermine intellectual debate and integrity, and create a chilled, divisive environment at our universities.

Opinions are mixed on the impact that "Israeli apartheid week" (IAW) has on the hearts and minds of those who traipse the hallowed halls of the academy. There are those who would have us believe that its influence is marginal, while others report a very different picture. Much depends on the organizational abilities and energy levels of anti-Israel activists at any given time on particular campuses.

What's clear, though, is that Jewish students and faculty, and the community agencies that support them, have not been able to effectively counter the lies and distortions that are at the core of "IAW" messaging.

An argument that was thought to have some merit uses the tenets of the "new" antisemitism as its anchor. Accordingly, the well-recognized 3Ds – demonization, delegitimization and the application of a double standard regarding the discourse on Israel – are invoked to make the case for obvious or intended antisemitism.

That demonization and delegitimization are implicit in the word association of "Israeli apartheid" is self-evident, and it's certainly not difficult to identify a raft of examples that confirm the double standard component of the definition. Where the problem arises, however, is that my university administration, and likely others as well, are tending more and more to dismiss our linkage of anti-Zionism with antisemitism.

And while it may be premature to relinquish the 3D para-

My View

Lawrence Hart

digm, we need nonetheless to examine other ways to get our point across more successfully.

In an insightful research paper, titled "Antisemitism in the Academic Voice," Kenneth Lasson, a professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law, presents a comprehensive analysis of antisemitism on North American (including Canadian) campuses.

Amid his list of recommendations to confront manifest antisemitism in the academy, he advises that we use self-restraint. We need to pick our battles. He also recommends that we derive strategies for "driving a wedge between the Jewish state's soft- and hard-core critics – between for example human-rights groups that take issue with Israeli policy and radical Islamists who deny the state's very legitimacy."

"It is the obligation of all academics," Lasson states, "either to recognize or refute claims that have no basis in fact or logic, and not to ignore them." He comments, moreover, that "not only can offensive speech and conduct be constitutionally confronted and condemned, but responsible administrators, faculty and students should have a moral imperative to do so." It's our responsibility to respond when "logic and common sense have gone awry and objective fact and documented history [have been] either ignored or denied." He adds: "History and logic should not be rendered meaningless by twisted rhetoric."

Lasson's advice is straightforward and sensible. But the problem we continue to encounter is that it's not so much what we say, or whose recommendations we follow, but who, if anyone, among our university leadership, is willing to listen – and take action.

'A Jew and an alcoholic'

Purim is behind us. Passover lies ahead. And between them are several Shabbats, twice as many kiddushes and who knows how many other opportunities to raise a glass and say l'chaim. And to seriously overdo things.

In reality, abuse doesn't need an excuse. And the problem doesn't stop at alcohol. For a long time, there has been a perception that Jews were not afflicted by the same addiction problems plaguing western society. Thankfully, there are now many organizations and individuals willing to listen and help Jews in distress. If you have a problem or if you have a family member with a problem, you can begin your search for resources online.

Long before people talked openly about these problems, there was JACS, Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others. Established in 1979 as a group for Jews in recovery, JACS now maintains branches and websites based in New York [http://bit.ly/jdrink26], Chicago, Baltimore, Florida, Brazil and Toronto. [http://bit.ly/jdrink27]

Perhaps the most moving site warning about potential dangers of alcohol was created by the family of Yehuda Aryeh Mond. At the age of 19, with his life ahead of him, Yehuda died due to alcohol abuse. His family created the Yehuda Mond Foundation to spread the word about alcohol and to provide resources to others. One of the highlights of the site is a chilling 40-minute video that includes a young man who shares how as a teen, "I had an orange juice container mixed with whisky in my fridge in yeshiva that I used to take swigs from throughout the day ... By the time I was 18, I was on the streets of Yerushalayim throwing up, wondering why I can't stop drinking." [http://bit.ly/jdrink28] I was interested to see that major streams of Judaism also recognize that problems exist in our own backyards. In its 1993 resolution, "dealing with substance abuse," the Union for Reform Judaism called for the introduction of "religious school educational programs for all levels, including the very young." [http://bit.ly/jdrink29]

The Orthodox Union site carries the piece, Orthodox Youth and Substance Abuse: Shattering the Myths. [http://bit.ly/jdrink30] And the Conservative movement has published From Addiction to Recovery: A Jewish Spiritual Journey. [http://bit.ly/jdrink31]

Other Jewish resources include Baltimore's Jewish Recovery Houses [http://bit.ly/jdrink32], New York's Yatzkan Center [http://bit.ly/jdrink33], Los Angeles' Beit T'Shuvah [http://bit.ly/jdrink34] and the Haderech 12-Step Treatment Center based in the Western Galilee. [http://bit.ly/jdrink35] Many more links here. [http://bit.ly/jdrink36]

When you do a search for substance abuse and Judaism, Rabbi Abraham Twerski's name is bound to come up often. Dr. Twerski is the medical director of Gateway Rehabilitation Center in Pennsylvania [http://bit.ly/jdrink37] and the author of countless compelling articles and books on the subject including The Twelve Steps and Judaism [http://bit.ly/jdrink38] and Tackling a Shandeh. [http://bit.ly/jdrink39]

Fortunately, there are successes. In Today I Am 20 Years Sober, the anonymous author writes, "My sobriety is a credit to God's name and none to me. Thank you, God. Thank you for all you have given me and all you have taken from me. Thank you for another day of life. Thank you for making me a Jew... and an alcoholic." [http://bit.ly/jdrink41]

Iran issue highlights Sunni-Shia tensions

Following Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's talks with Prime Minister Stephen Harper in Ottawa and U.S. President Barack Obama in Washington, D.C., last week, substantial media coverage implied that Netanyahu is recklessly itching for war with Iran.

The reality is that Israel has been warning for years that a nuclear-armed Iran is a menace to the international community, not just to Israel, which has been repeatedly threatened with destruction by Tehran. Israel has emphasized that it's the responsibility of the international community to rein in Iran by all means necessary, short of war. This includes tough economic sanctions, some of which are only beginning to take effect. Still, many analysts see these as too little too late, and thus insufficient to derail Iran's illicit nuclear program.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

By the middle of last week came the announcement that major powers, including China, Russia, the United States, and some EU countries, had decided to once again try negotiations with Iran. Catherine Ashton, the EU's foreign affairs chief, hoped that "Iran will now enter into a sustained process of constructive dialogue which will deliver real progress."

But there's widespread skepticism that further talks with Iran, scheduled to start in April, will provide anything other than a cover for Iran to stall for time while it pushes ahead with nuclear fuel enrichment and related weapons programs. Words such as "sustained" and "progress" have a double entendre meaning where Tehran is concerned.

This skepticism is bolstered by other considerations. Efraim Halevy, a former head of Israel's Mossad, recently argued (in the New Republic) that Arab and Muslim leaders in the Middle East have learned a valuable lesson from last year's NATO campaign in Libya. Recall that in 2003, then-Libyan leader Muammar Gadhafi gave up Libya's nuclear arms program in exchange for re-engagement with the West. The lesson for Iran today: don't follow Libya's lead if you plan to survive, since having nuclear weapons is the best guarantee against attack.

Halevy put this starkly: "In light of the Libyan experience, what nuclear aspiring nation can now put its trust in a rollback deal of any sort? When NATO took to the skies over Tripoli, Benghazi and Misrata, it delivered the greatest possible blow to future non-proliferation diplomacy."

Efraim Halevy

Chatter about such a "peaceful" resolution of the Iran nuclear crisis contrasted with commentary about Israel's "aggressive" inclinations. But there was an important element of the overall story that was missing from almost all the coverage, namely, that Sunni Arab states, especially Saudi Arabia, feel very threatened by the prospect of a nuclear-armed Shia Iran.

In the past, the Saudi king has urged the Americans to "cut off the head of the snake" in reference to Iran. His ambassador to the United States urged the same, and was subsequently found to be the target of an Iranian assassination plot planned to unfold in Washington.

Reports at the time indicated that the Saudis, while certainly not saying so publicly, were also secretly counting on the Israelis (with U.S. backing) to confront Iran militarily.

As the "Arab Spring" has resulted in the rise of the Muslim Brotherhood (in Libya, Tunisia, Egypt, etc.), a fascinating paradox has emerged. The Brotherhood is extremely hostile to Israel. But it's also hostile to Shia Iran (even though Iran has offered to provide funds to Egypt, whose economy is teetering and whose leadership has been pulling away from the Americans). Yet while Iran is helping Syria's Assad brutally repress a rebellion led mainly by the majority Sunnis, even Hamas, an outgrowth of the Brotherhood which formerly relied on Iranian funds, has had to distance itself from Iran and side with its Sunni brethren.

So it was most unexpected to see a report last week in the Guardian that a senior Hamas official said Hamas might not react if Israel were to attack Iran (although this was later denied). But in the broader context of the contest between Sunni and Shia forces in the Arab world, this story might not be as shocking as it appears.

Reena Community Residence, Apartments Now Renting

By Ellen Rajzman, Residence Manager

An innovative new housing alternative, the Reena Community Residence, is opening on the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan. There are 60 apartments, some of which are wheelchair accessible. The Residence supports a mixed community of 84 adults and seniors with developmental, cognitive, physical and mental health needs.

Reena's philosophy recognizes that physical presence is key in enhancing inclusion and integration. "This is a very unique and special living environment," says Sandy Keshen, President and CEO of Reena. Membership at the nearby Schwartz/Reisman Centre will be offered to residents at a reduced rate. This includes a seniors' centre, indoor aquatics centre and therapeutic pool, community arts centre, athletic activities, and a wide range of classes. Residents will be integrated into campus/community life, with easy access to on-site Jewish communal agencies such as Circle of Care, Jewish Family & Child and the Mount Sinai Wellness Clinic.

Designed as an Intentional Community for residents with special needs, the Residence offers tenants the benefits of living and sharing life together. Thirty of the 60 units are designated as rent-assisted through the York Region Rent Assistance Program. In addition to the rent, there is a support component at a cost of $450 per month. This provides 24/7 on-call staff for safety and security, medication reminders, and activity prompts. Any additional supports are costed on a fee-for-service basis.

While requests for apartments for people with developmental disabilities are being placed on a wait list, there are still a few units available for seniors and people with physical disabilities. For information on rentals for seniors and people with physical disabilities contact Arnold Foss at Circle of Care at 416.373.4090. To be placed on a wait list for units for people with developmental disabilities contact Reena at 905.889.6484 Ext. 2050 or Ext. 2057.

NCJW Passover food drive returns for 29th year

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When Bonnie Dale volunteered at National Council of Jewish Women Canada, Toronto section's first Passover Food Drive, there were about 200 recipients.

This year, for the organization's 29th food drive, volunteers will deliver food to about 2,500 addresses, said Dale, who is co-chairing the drive with Karen Fenwick.

Recipients, who include individuals living in poverty, recent immigrants in need and people with disabilities and inadequate financial resources, are referred from agencies, synagogues, schools, service groups and chaplaincy services.

One recipient, a single father with a 12-year-old daughter, lost his business in the economic downturn and went bankrupt. When his daughter leaves for school each day, she thinks her father is working from home. In reality, however, he's receiving welfare. The Passover box provides him with the food and ritual items necessary to celebrate Passover.

Each box contains such items as matzah, gefilte fish, tuna, canned fruit, matzah ball mix with soup, Passover wine, a Haggadah, candles and sweets.

Fenwick said that kosher for Passover food – collected at participating grocery stores, schools, community centres and synagogues – makes up approximately 10 per cent of the needed supplies.

"The project is solely funded by donations, and monetary donations are needed so we can buy the necessary items at wholesale prices," she said.

She said that in the last couple of years, organizers have noticed that people who were formerly working are starting to have financial difficulties. "There is an increase in single-parent families, and we've seen that there are a number of men between the ages of 50 and 64 who have lost their job and are without income. These growing demographics affect the food drive. There is a decrease in funds and an increase in need."

Dara Ronen-Nathanson the drive's scheduling coordinator, says when she retired as a teacher in the Jewish school system, she wanted to volunteer. "I saw the schools get involved in the drive, and now I'm seeing it from the other side."

When the drive started, she said, it was in about two or three schools. "Now we're in 20 schools, and we've started a project called Matzah Bricks. The kids buy a "brick" for $2, and their name is put on it. This encourages them to give tzedakah."

One preschool, she said, has the kids create a Passover shopping list, "and then they go shopping to buy food to donate. We're trying to educate kids at an early age to help other kids in financial need."

The community is "tremendous" in its support of the food drive, she said, and more than 1,500 volunteers donate their time to sort, pack, supervise and deliver food boxes.

Beginning March 11, schools, groups and organizations began coming in to pack boxes, she said. "A greeting card is placed in every box, so it becomes more personal," Fenwick said.

She said organizers always need volunteer drivers to deliver the boxes on delivery day, which this year is March 25, 8:30 a.m. until noon.

"Delivery day – volunteers can show up at 4700 Bathurst St. – is always a heartwarming day. We really see the good in the community," said Fenwick.

"Some volunteers come with babies in car seats, and others drive their grandchildren, who drop off the boxes."

Ronen-Nathanson called the food drive a labour of love. "We want everyone in financial need to celebrate Passover with dignity."

Dale said it's a real "hands-on project. It's not just about giving money. It's about getting involved."

For information on donating to the drive or volunteering, call 416-633-5100.

March of Living honours people with disabilities

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

For many Jews, the words "six million" subconsciously and automatically connect to the Holocaust.

In addition to the six million Jews murdered during the Holocaust, millions more were victimized by the Nazis.

March of the Living and the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind (IGDCB) have organized a special tour that will honour the tens of thousands of people with disabilities who were murdered by the Nazis in their evil quest to create an Aryan master race.

On April 16, a group of about 22 people – including six visually impaired Israelis and their guide dogs – will spend five days touring Poland's concentration camps on a March of the Living tour.

"It's really a powerful statement, because as the Nazis used dogs to kill and maim, we are going to show how dogs are used for independence... and self-worth," said Sara Gabriel, the executive director of the Canadian Friends of IGDCB, an Israeli non-profit organization that provides visually impaired Israelis with trained guide dogs.

The Nazis began persecuting their most vulnerable citizens in 1933 after passing a law that stated anyone suffering from a mental illness, physical deformity, blindness or deafness was to be sterilized, and was labelled as "life unworthy of life."

By the end of World War II, about 275,000 people with disabilities were murdered.

But Eli Rubenstein, who's led March for the Living Canada for the last 25 years and volunteers as IGDCB's chair, said this trip is about more than highlighting the Nazis' crimes against the vulnerable.

"March of the Living is not just about what the Nazis did, it's about telling ourselves and the world that Jewish people stand for exactly the opposite of what the Nazis stood for," Rubenstein said.

"They were out to build a world of cruelty and barbarism and exclusion, and not to build a world of compassion and kindness and inclusion. In Judaism we believe that all humanity was created in the image of God and all humanity has infinite preciousness and dignity."

Moti Levy and his dog, Sammy, will be going on the March of the Living tour next month.

Gabriel, who has been working to promote and raise funds for IGDCB from her Thornhill home since 2009, said this is the first time the centre has sent its clients on a March of the Living trip.

When Gabriel approached the donors about the idea to send IGDCB clients to Poland, she received "an overwhelming response."

Thanks to their generosity, six blind Israelis will fulfil their dreams of experiencing the march, Rubenstein said.

"I remember one who told me, 'Blind people have challenges, more than most. But when I hear a Holocaust survivor speak, and I see how they overcame their challenges, mine are incomparably minor and they give me strength, hope and courage,'" Rubenstein said.

He said he was also motivated to organize a march that would display the contrast between the way Nazis used dogs and the way the centre uses dogs.

"You think of what the Nazis did to the Jews, you think what the Nazis did to people with disabilities and you think of what the Nazis did to dogs. They took dogs and turned them into killers," he said.

"We're doing the opposite... we're coming with dogs who were trained to be the gentlest, kindest, most giving creatures you could possibly imagine."

On April 18, on Yom Hashoah, the IGDCB group will join roughly 14,000 people from all over the world in a three-kilometre march between Auschwitz and Birkenau.

"Whether you're sighted or whether you're visually impaired, the physical presence of being in Poland on Yom Hashoah is a very powerful statement," Rubenstein said.

Joining the IGDCB group will be York Centre MP Mark Adler, the son of a Holocaust survivor, who will be honoured at the centre's IGDCB annual gala called the Evening of Miracles. It'll be held at the Eglinton Grand in Toronto on May 31 and will feature a performance by singer Nikki Yanofsky.

USY holds two conventions in Toronto area

Compiled by CJN Staff

Toronto recently hosted two youth conventions organized by the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

United Synagogue Youth (USY) is the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and Kadima is the middle school affiliate. Both conventions offered Jewish teens from all across Ontario the opportunity to enjoy exciting activities – a blend of education, social action and fun.

Eastern Canada Region United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY) delegates gathered at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue in Toronto from Feb. 24 to 26 to explore Jewish humour.

USYers enjoyed an evening of laughter that included a medley of YouTube videos voted on by USYers as the funniest videos of the year, as well as a show by renowned hypnotist Chris Johnson. They explored Jewish stereotypes as they appear in Jewish jokes and Jewish comedy, and discussed how joking and practical jokes can go too far and hurt people. They also learned about Purim customs.

"Our conventions are designed to allow Jewish teens from across Eastern Canada to get to know each other while engaging in both fun and educational activities," said ECRUSY director Rabbi Irit Printz.

ECRUSY Kadima delegates began their convention, at the Homewood Suites Hotel in Markham, Ont., on March 2. The convention's theme was "Kadima Goes to the Circus."

Kadimaniks discussed the team skills needed to run a successful circus – or any group gathering. They learned about the Jewish value of caring for animals, experienced a fun and spirited Shabbat, and enjoyed a night of circus training at Centre of Gravity in downtown Toronto.

"The trainers did a demonstration for us. They were like ninjas, except they had hula hoops and ropes," said one Kadimanik.

Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, Ont., will host ECRUSY's spring convention from May 10 to 13. The convention's theme, "Back to the Future," was announced by convention co-chairs Joshua Seed and Haley Szereszewski.

RHS alumni gather as school marks 50 years

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA) – formerly United Synagogue Day School (USDS) – will celebrate its 50th birthday this month at a gala event followed the next day by a Kabbalat Shabbat service and dinner for alumni at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

The hors d'oeuvres and dessert gala, featuring comedian Elon Gold, will be held at 7 p.m., Mar. 22, at the Warehouse Event Venue at Downsview Park.

Shauna Merkur, gala co-chair with Sara Gottlieb, expects about 300 people at the event, a fundraiser for technology, bursaries and alumni initiatives.

Claire Sumerlus, head of school for the past three years, describes RHA as "an incredibly warm community that is dedicated to academic excellence in both Jewish education and general studies."

She lauded the "great foundation" the school had built before she arrived in Toronto from Winnipeg. It made it "easier to move it into the 21st century, because education has really changed and the world has really changed."

Her predecessor, Lucy Cohen, retired in 2007, and the school was without a head of school for more than a year.

RHA, which has 600 students from junior kindergarten to Grade 8 at two campuses, is the largest school in the Solomon Schechter Day School Network. The network operates under the umbrella of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

Debbie Rothstein

Alumni chair Debbie Rothstein said she made lifelong friends at USDS, which was renamed in 2010.

As well, she credited her former teachers for "assuming a certain level of intellectual maturity" on the part of the students. "They were constantly challenging us. They spoke to us as if we weren't kids."

Rothstein – a school parent and also the granddaughter of one of the school's founders, J. Barney Goldhar – noted that RHA is the only Conservative school in the city. As a parent and a Conservative Jew, that was important to her, she said.

USDS' first principal, Aaron Nussbaum, recalls that the school actually dates back a few years longer than half a century.

USDS started as a "foundation school" at Beth Tzedec in the late 1950s, said Nussbaum, who retired as director of education 19 years ago.

The term "foundation school" meant "that children would be attending nursery [through] Grade 2, like a foundation," he explained.

"The kids would get a fantastic background in language and many other things – in happy living Jewishly – and then the idea was to go to the public school, so that you get both worlds – the Jewish world, the Hebrew world – and that when they started an afternoon school they would be starting with a great foundation.

"At the same time, you would not keep kids out of the mainstream of the public school. That was a very important ideal for many of the early generations. As well, this was supposed to be the approach of the Conservative movement in the '50s and early '60s… The idea was to integrate into [North] American life, not to be ghettoized."

The foundation school approach was proposed by the Conservative movement but taken up only by a small number of congregations, he said. Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg, then Beth Tzedec's spiritual leader, was a driving force in the school's creation.

But something unexpected happened, Nussbaum said. "When children reached the end of Grade 2, the feeling was 'It's so good to have a day school – let's continue on.'"

The new school, for which Nussbaum was hired as principal in 1961, was sponsored by all of Toronto's Conservative congregations – hence its name. There were 115 students.

"It was a small, little school," Nussbaum said. "Everybody knew everybody."

Among the school's innovations, he noted, it was termed a beit chinuch (house of education) instead of a beit Sefer (sefer is Hebrew for book), to reflect the idea that education isn't limited to books.

As well, there was an attempt to integrate general studies material into the Hebrew department and vice versa, a new idea at the time.

The school grew, and in 1969 a second branch opened at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on Bayview Avenue. (A third branch, in Richmond Hill, opened about 30 years ago, but has since closed.)

At one point about 30 years ago, USDS ran a Jewish day high school, Nussbaum said. It merged with the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto after three years of operation.

Also, he mentioned, in the mid-1970s USDS was the first school to get a Solomon Schechter award for excellence in Jewish education.

UJA Federation funds gender-based violence training in Juba

IsraAID experts lead first ever workshop in South Sudan

By Daniel Horowitz

On Thursday March 2, IsraAID: The Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid dispatched a delegation of Israeli experts to Juba, South Sudan, with the support of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, IsraAID's largest financial supporter. The delegation - which includes three highly-skilled Israeli therapists with extensive experience in trauma and sexual abuse - is conducting the first ever Gender Based Violence (GBV) training program for social workers in Juba, aimed at fighting violence against women in the new nation.

On March 6th, the South Sudanese Minister of Social Development, Her Excellency Helen Murshalli, officially inaugurated the program which, during the 10-day workshop, will see IsraAID teach 29 social workers from the ministry and the local NGO Confident Children out of Conflict (CCC) the practical skills needed to guide and support survivors of GBV from Juba and the entire Central Equatorial district.

In her speech, her Excellency stressed the key role that social workers play in building a stable and healthy nation. For this reason, training social workers should be a priority in the development of South Sudan. Her Excellency also praised IsraAID for organizing the first training on GBV for social workers, and highlighted the historic relationship between Israel and South Sudan, calling for a deepening and strengthening of the ties that connect these two nations, as did the Executive Director of IsraAID, Shachar Zahavi.

"IsraAID recognizes the dramatic opportunity for the organization - as well as for Israel as a whole - to contribute to nation-building and development in South Sudan through the transfer of Israeli expertise," said Zahavi. "Israel benefits from unique 'know-how' and technologies in a wide range of areas, and is therefore capable of organizing rich and impact-oriented training programs in response to the local needs, while respecting and promoting local ownership."

IsraAID's team of experts are in Juba, South Sudan, to train local social workers about violence against women and young girls.

On March 1st, news of IsraAID'S efforts in Juba made its way to the House of Commons, where the MP for St. Paul's, Dr. Carolyn Bennett, made the following statement.

MP Dr. Carolyn Bennett

"On the eve of a visit to Canada by Israel's Prime Minister, I would like to acknowledge the important work of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in partnering with IsraAID, an Israeli humanitarian organization, to help South Sudan fight violence against women," said Dr. Bennett. "...The program is funded primarily by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and by extension, charitable donations from Toronto's Jewish community, and is an example of the close level of cooperation between Canadians and Israelis on important global issues. I applaud UJA and IsraAID for this important contribution to nation-building and development in South Sudan."

"UJA Federation has long been a supporter of IsraAID's remarkable search and rescue, medical, trauma and other life-saving efforts when natural disasters have struck around the world," said Ted Sokolsky, UJA Federation's President & CEO. "And now, to enable these gifted Israeli experts to help eradicate senseless, brutal violence against women and young girls in South Sudan, is extremely gratifying. We will continue to provide IsraAID with our support, and the support of Toronto's compassionate Jewish community."

Two-year-old's birthday benefits underprivileged Israeli children

By Monique Gottlieb

When Reuben Hason turned two last December, his parents, Cheri and Yuval, decided to celebrate a little differently. In lieu of gifts, Reuben's family and friends were asked to contribute to the Reuben Hason Birthday Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the endowment arm of UJA Federation. Given the festive time of year and the family's strong connection to Israel, the Hasons decided to put the funds raised toward a Chanukah party for underprivileged children at the Youth Futures program in Eilat.

Historically, Eilat-Eilot has been a single-industry region, with 80% of the population employed either directly or indirectly by the tourist industry. These jobs generally don't demand professional training or promise a stable income. Through various initiatives, UJA Federation is working to transform Eilat-Eilot into a centre of opportunity. The Youth Futures program is one such initiative which empowers disadvantaged Israeli youth, providing them with equal opportunity to develop their academic and social skills, and shaping them into successful adults.

Thanks to Reuben's gift, the children at the Youth Futures program had an unforgettable Chanukah, participating in various holiday activities like cooking latkes, making candles, and decorating dreidels. As well, each child received a Chanukah present – for many of them, their first. In a letter thanking Reuben for his gift, the children wrote, "It doesn't matter who you ask, this Chanukah was like no other! All through Chanukah's school break the Youth Futures home was lit and anywhere you looked you could see happy faces."

While Reuben is still too young to understand the impact he has made, the idea of tzedakah runs strong in his family. The amount of money raised in honour of his birthday spoke volumes. "Everyone was happy to contribute," explained Reuben's mother, Cheri. "It was really reassuring to know that our family and friends were so eager to participate in something like this. Hopefully others will be inspired to do the same."

By giving his birthday gifts to underprivileged children, Reuben has already practiced tikkun olam (repairing the world.) Reuben's gift demonstrates how easy it can be to make a difference in the world. "I think people are intimidated; that it's a hard thing to do, but the staff at the Jewish Foundation made it so easy," explained Cheri.

Reuben Hason celebrating his 2nd birthday

The Jewish Foundation is involved in many charitable projects in Canada, Israel, and around the world. The Foundation specializes in matching individuals to projects and causes they are passionate about, enabling them to make a positive, meaningful impact in the lives of others. By housing a fund at the Jewish Foundation, fund-holders have the freedom to choose how they want to spend their charitable dollars without the hassle of maintaining a private foundation.

"My grandmother always said, 'do the right thing, not the easy thing,' said Cheri. With the help of the Jewish Foundation, Reuben's birthday project was both."

Landmark deli Schwartz's enters new era

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Hy Diamond signed over Schwartz's to new owners last week, confident that he did all he could to ensure it remains the old-fashioned Jewish-style deli that is known around the world.

Diamond, who bought Schwartz's Charcuterie Hebraique de Montréal Inc. in 1999, after acting as the accountant for years to its previous owner, always referred to himself as "only its curator" rather than proprietor.

"I built it up into the institution it is today, a part of Quebec known all over the world. When I walked in, it was just going along – going downhill," he said in an interview.

"I hate like hell to sell it. I really enjoyed it, but I'm not getting younger and my health is not getting better. It was time to pass on the legacy. I'm leaving [Schwartz's] in good shape."

After weeks of rumours, Schwartz's was sold March 5 to the Nakis family and René Angélil, along with his wife Céline Dion and two of his nephews, for a reported sum of almost $10 million.

Diamond is satisfied the 85-year-old little restaurant on the Main is in the hands of Montrealers who recognize the restaurant's historical and cultural significance and will carry on the tradition.

"Hy Diamond has poured his heart and soul into building this business, and not only do we want to thank him for his dedication, but we want him to be proud of our efforts to continue along the same path," Angélil said in a press release.

"Of course, we'll make a few improvements as necessary, but we're not interested in diluting the brand by franchising or making the deli something that it isn't. It's truly one of a kind, and we intend to keep it this way."

"Paul Nakis [the family patriarch] is a friend of mine, a successful restaurateur. René has been coming in here since he was a youngster," Diamond said.

Angélil noted that his close friend and then-manager of his band, the late Montreal show-business promoter Ben Kaye, first brought him to Schwartz's in 1961.

"I've been going there ever since. I have so many great memories of being there with the guys, and with Céline and our families throughout the years. It's the most unique restaurant in the world, and we're thrilled to be part of it."

The younger partners make it sound like they have been handed a sacred trust. "I am honoured to be able to contribute to one of this city's greatest legacies," Anastasia Nakis said in a statement.

"My brother Eric and I are extremely proud to be part of this wonderful heritage," Martin Sara said.

The new owners extol how great the smoked meat is and how well it sells, so it would seem that they won't change it.

They're not the first non-Jews to own Schwartz's. Diamond's predecessor was the legendary "Madame" Armande Chartrand, who inherited it from her friend, Maurice Zbriger in 1981.

Neither was a restaurateur – Zbriger, in fact, was a violinist, composer and conductor – nor did they take an active role in running the place.

Diamond said that when he took it over, Schwartz's was deteriorating. He put a lot of money into bringing the physical premises up to date without changing the seedy way it had looked for decades. He also hired new staff and improved the food quality, without touching the menu.

Schwartz's deli has been a fixture on the Main for more than eight decades. [Jonathan Wenk photo]

He was a hands-on owner. His office was upstairs (he also owned the building) and was in the restaurant nearly every day.

"I had no restaurant experience. I just used common sense, saw what people liked," he said

Diamond also worked hard on public relations. He nurtured a documentary, a history and a play, Schwartz's: The Musical , which ran at Centaur Theatre last year and was so popular that its run was extended and it was reprised in the summer.

There were articles published everywhere, even in upscale Gourmet magazine, and Tourism Montreal made Schwartz's a regular stop for visiting journalists.

He also linked Schwartz's with a number of charities, including his favourite cause: ovarian cancer research and education, in memory of his wife, Doris.

The Montreal Hebrew Delicatessen was founded by Romanian-Jewish immigrant Reuben Schwartz a few doors away from the current site. The canopy over the entrance says that it was founded in 1930, but the most widely accepted date now is 1928.

Eiran Harris, archivist emeritus of the Jewish Public Library, who has eaten at Schwartz's for 50 years and wrote a history of smoked meat in Montreal, wants to set the record straight.

"The delicatessen – it was not called Schwartz's then – opened Saturday, Dec. 31, 1927, after sundown, 5-1/2 hours before midnight, to be precise," he said.

The deli was kosher for its first few years, and stopped being so during the Depression, apparently to cut costs.

As devoted as he is to Schwartz's fare, Harris contends it has not been a Jewish deli for at least 25 years, ever since Jews ceased to be the majority of its clients.

The turning point, he believes, was when medical warnings about the dangers of eating fat and cholesterol started getting louder and louder. "Jews were prime candidates for cardiovascular disease, and they were greatly influenced by that advice."

One thing he hopes Angélil et al do not remove is the shmutz that begrimes the smoke room, which, as anyone who saw the musical knows, is Schwartz's dirty little secret. Harris attributes the deli's staying power and international reputation to the food, the colourful waiters, the cosy (read cramped) ambience, and "word of mouth."

"Water may have dripped on my head from the ceiling, but I never had a bad food experience there," he said.

"I'll give the owners the benefit of the doubt for now, but when there are several partners, and all are looking at the bank balance and how to recoup their investment quickly, you can never be certain what they will do."

And if anyone thinks they would be foolhardy to tamper with a winning formula, Harris only has to mention the fiasco of New Coke.

Vancouver's Lavan struggles against boycott

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — All Shanie Bar-Oz wants to do is sell her line of personal care products made with Dead Sea minerals.

The 33-year-old entrepreneur opened Lavan, her shop in downtown Vancouver, two years ago, and she's the first to admit it's been tough going. Her clients love the products, but it's the picketing outside her store by a group calling itself the Boycott Israel Apartheid Campaign (BIAC) that's making business a struggle.

Shanie Bar-Oz

"It's been devastating," she told The CJN. "I'm under a boycott from a group that's spreading false information about my company, saying that Lavan is taking advantage of Palestinian rights and preventing their access to the Dead Sea, and that we have apartheid values. Basically they are calling us Nazis, claiming we come from a dark place that downgrades people because of their race."

This is the third boycott Bar-Oz has experienced since November 2011, when the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver notified her that she should expect picketing outside her store.

"I was hysterical," she recalled of that first incident. "I couldn't sleep for a few days before they started, and we were afraid the demonstrators would get violent."

Her worst fears didn't materialize, and many members of the Jewish community and supporters of Israel came to the store to buy products and show their solidarity.

With the two demonstrations that followed, though, it was more difficult to find that support, particularly because the picketers would show up at unpredictable times. Still, her inbox is filled with well-wishers, with e-mails proclaiming "Am Yisrael Chai," and she has many "likes" on her Facebook page.

"I really appreciate every phone call and show of support, but it doesn't solve my problem," Bar-Oz said.

"We're significantly down in sales compared to last year, but aside from that, this has hurt my reputation. It has been so hard to get Lavan to the place where it is right now, and I've worked so hard to build this business. Today, if you search for Lavan on YouTube or Google, BIAC's material comes first, not my material, and that hurts the brand."

"Lavan can't solve the conflict – it's a skin care brand," she said. "I can have a political agenda, but the brand cannot, and the problem is it's not me that's under attack, it's the business."

During the group's protest on Feb. 12, Bar-Oz called the police to the scene, but when they arrived they said there was nothing illegal about the boycott and there was nothing they could do to help her.

The latest demonstrations against Israel were part of the annual "Israeli Apartheid Week" on campuses around the world, and Bar-Oz, her staff and her customers had to wade past more than 25 picketers standing on the sidewalk and handing out leaflets.

In response, as it has in the past, Buycott Israel, an initiative of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, issued calls to supporters of Israel to patronize the shop on Feb. 19 and 26. And on Feb. 22, federal Citizenship Minister Jason Kenney visited the store and made several purchases.

BIAC is part of the international boycott, divestment and sanctions movement. Its website urges Israel to "recognize the Palestinian people's inalienable right to self-determination and fully complies with the precepts of international law."

Charlotte Kates, a spokesperson for BIAC, didn't respond to requests for comment by The CJN's deadline. But in an article in the Huffington Post, she argued that hurting the Lavan brand and its business is precisely the point.

"We're part of an ongoing campaign to boycott Israeli goods until it complies with international law," she said. "Israel has no right to exist. No state has a right to exist as a racist state. Israel exists through the continuing dispossession of Palestinian land. Seven million Palestinians are prohibited from returning to their homes, because it is said they will disrupt the demographic majority in Israel. Israel denies other people its rights. We think the conversation needs to be less about the claimed rights of governments and more about human rights."

In recent years, BIAC has also boycotted Chapters-Indigo, Zim Integrated Shipping and the Mountain Equipment Co-Op.

But for a small business owner like Bar-Oz, the economic effects of the boycott have been terrible. "I want to have Lavan product on every shelf some day, just like Ahava," she says. "But right now, Lavan is not Ahava. I don't have investors – it's just me and my business partner in Israel at the factory, and the boycott has been devastating."

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

אבל שישאר בינינו.

השופט שלא שר את "התקווה"

מצלמות הטלביזיה הראו את טקס החלפת נשיאת בית המשפט העליון, ובו, רחמנא לצלן, השופט הלא יהודי סאלים ג'ובראן שותק בזמן שירת התקווה. תוך דקות- פורצת מהומה בביצה, וחברי כנסת מהימין הקיצוני "דורשים" לנזוף בו ולהעניש. כמות הסירחון שיוצאת לאחרונה מקבוצה קטנה זו של חברי כנסת פאשיסטים בשם הלאומנות היהדית, איננה יודעת גבול. מה הם מצפים, שאיש דרוזי או ערבי ישירו "כל עוד בלבב פנימה נפש יהודי הומיה"?

הרי ההימנון הישראלי, מטבע הטקסט והסנטימנט היהודי הברור שבו, מוציא כל מי שאיננו יהודי מן הקונסנסוס שהימנון אמור להביא איתו. היה מי שהציע בשעתו את שירו של טשרניחובסקי "שחקי שחקי על החלומות" שמביא את העקרון של להיות בנאדם, ללא הבדל דת או כת. אבל לצפות מערבי או דרוזי לשיר את התקווה- מזכיר לי קלגסים שמאלצים יהודים לרקוד בצל הרובים שלהם בגטו. איך יתכן שחברי כנסת יהודיים, בנים ונכדים של אנשים שהושפלו על ידי גויים ונדרשו להראות אהבה והזדהות למדינות ששנאו אותם- יכולים להיות כל כך סתומים וגסים!

מזל שהשר יעלון הזכיר לכולם שקציני צבא דרוזיים - איש איננו מצפה מהם לשיר את התקווה.

עלונדון

ענת קורן, אדם יקר, היא היוזמת ובעלת העיתון הישראלי של לונדון, אנגליה, עלונדון שמו. הכתיבה צעירה, קולחת עכשווית, הקצב מדליק והקריאה בכיף. תענוג לראות שעיתון ישראלי בנכר יכול לצאת ברמה כל כך מכובדת.

Dealing with mental illness

Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin

She was frail and emaciated. A feeding tube fed her starving body after she had refused to eat for weeks. Her hands were in restraints to protect her from herself.

This was how I first met Dorothy in a downtown hospital that specialized in patients suffering from anorexia and other eating disorders. This was my first hospital visit after having just moved to Toronto to begin my new rabbinic post, and although I've seen a lot in my years in the rabbinate, Dorothy's plight shook me to the core.

Dorothy was much more than anorexic; for 20 out of her short 30 years, she had endured various physical ailments that left her in constant pain. But the most painful disease of all was the one that could not be detected by any lab test. Dorothy suffered from mental illness, an illness that left her depressed, confused, suicidal at times, and unable to live with and by herself. A pretty young lady with bright blue eyes who should have been in the prime of a happy life with a husband and children was instead languishing in a hospital bed, where her tragic end had already been scripted.

Four months later, Dorothy was dead.

Dorothy's family's efforts were nothing less than heroic in fighting to keep her alive. She was in and out of treatment centres, and no stone was unturned in seeking the best treatment for her. Outstanding doctors and psychiatrists, many of them part of her own community, were administering to her illness and doing the best they could to treat an invisible and elusive disease. But even the best doctors can lose patients. One doctor who specializes in eating disorders spoke at Dorothy's funeral. He expressed a combination of sympathy, profound sadness, and the beleaguered voice of a soldier who's been on the battlefield too long and seen too many friends succumb to the battle.

Mental illness can sometimes be the most difficult disease to deal with, both for the patient and her caregivers. The patient suffers not only through her illness but also the skepticism of others who may think she's "faking" it or can be easily cured if only she'd "grow up" or shake herself back to reality. Her family lives in constant doubt, never knowing if they've done too much or not enough to help her get well.

It is also an extremely lonely illness. When a person displays physical symptoms, the community shows compassion and does its best to take care of the physically handicapped, the cancer patient, and so forth. But when a person is mentally ill, some shy away and may even get a bit "freaked out." It may be because we don't take it seriously, or that the patient's illness causes her to say or do hostile and repelling things. Perhaps we're even frightened when we encounter the mentally ill patient, because we detect a shadow of that very same pathology within ourselves; we're worried that it's contagious and that our own mental state might become "infected" if we stick around too long.

Dorothy was a member of an Orthodox shul. She had attended the finest Jewish day schools and came to shul with her parents on Shabbat. Even after her illness set in, she would have lucid moments when she was a loving and sensitive daughter and sister. Despite the loneliness, confusion and pain, Dorothy courageously persisted in her struggle to achieve the normalcy that she could never have.

Although we have wonderful mental health professionals, we still haven't come completely to terms with mental illness as a community. As embracing and tight-knit a Jewish community can be, Dorothy did not find complete acceptance in her religious surroundings, partially because she was misunderstood by people who were simply uneducated in matters of mental illness.

At around the age of 10, she began displaying symptoms of the mental illness that would eventually claim her life. Some of her teachers, unequipped to deal with this kind of problem, tried their best to counsel her parents and provide whatever help they could. Sometimes, their "advice" was based on a distorted worldview that assumed that religion had all the answers to one's mental and emotional problems. One particularly insensitive teacher told her parents that the reason Dorothy was acting out such strange behaviour was because her parents were contributing to her anxiety by allowing this intelligent girl to ask too many questions. All she needed to do was learn to place her faith in God, and that would allay her turbulent outbursts.

We cannot afford to ignore mental illness within the Jewish community. Too many of our friends and neighbours suffer in silence, embarrassed by the stigma to themselves and their families. Some are embarrassed to acknowledge such a problem within themselves or their family, out of a fear that it might adversely affect the family reputation and the ability for the other children to find a good shidduch. But this only speaks to the urgency for the rest of us to react with greater sensitivity and awareness.

If you know someone in your synagogue or community who is depressed or displaying signs of mental illness, reach out. Make sure they're getting the proper medical attention and that they aren't isolated from the rest of the world. The Torah tells us that we must not stand by idly as our brother's or sister's blood is being spilled. Don't hide behind your own fears or out of a concern of being overly intrusive. Don't assume the family has everything under control. You may make the difference between life and death. If you're not sure how to proceed, seek out your rabbi, Jewish family services or a mental health professional who can guide you.

For those who pretended Dorothy wasn't there, they don't need to pretend anymore. May her memory serve as a blessing and inspiration for all of us.

Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin is the spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation. The name of the deceased has been changed.

DAFFODIL DRIVE: Grade 8 students at Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School sold daffodils to raise money for cancer research and dedicated their efforts to the memory of the brother of Omrit Aharoni, one of their teachers. The students also created signs and made announcements with personal connections to their loved ones who have survived or been lost to cancer. The project was part of the school's Hineni (I am here) initiative that promotes tikkun olam and social activism.

Conference to examine Shoah in Soviet Union

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

University of Toronto Yiddish professor Anna Shternshis hopes a three-day conference on Soviet Jewry during the Holocaust will shed some light on a subject that, until recently, was virtually inaccessible.

Anna Shternshis

The Moscow-born Shternshis – one of the organizers of the March 24-26 conference, to be held at U of T, titled "Jewish Life and Death in the Soviet Union during World War II" – explained that the Soviet Union never fully acknowledged Jewish suffering during the war.

"Twenty seven million Soviet people died during World War II, and they didn't feel that separating the Jewish experience was worth it," Shternshis said.

She added that 2.8 million Soviet Jews died in the Holocaust, but unlike Polish Jews, they weren't sent to concentration camps.

"Instead, they were killed where they lived, in their villages and towns. Many were shot, many were killed by neighbours, many were killed by the Einsatzgruppen [Nazi death squads]."

She said while there is an abundance of records about the fate of Polish Jews, because the Nazis were very meticulous in keeping records there, "in the Soviet Union, because so much of it was locally executed... they didn't have such records of what happened."

This is coupled with the fact that the role of local collaboration is a highly contested topic in Russia today. As for archival materials that do exist, until the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, they were virtually inaccessible.

"In the '40s, Soviet Jewish writers and journalists were trying to put together a book about the testimonies from locals and Jews who survived called the Black Book of Soviet Jewry... What was allowed to be published was very selected parts of the testimony," Shternshis said.

"There were government documents, special commissions that were sent to the villages and towns in the Ukraine and Belarus, that documented exactly what happened in 1943 and 1944. The results of those commissions were also not made public."

She said that the conference will give the public an opportunity to hear from a number of Russian scholars who have since had access to these "secret documents and will talk about what the Soviet Union knew about the Holocaust, what they chose to share with the general public and what they chose to keep secret."

Co-sponsored by U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies, the conference will also present academics from Germany, the Netherlands, Israel, United States and Canada.

The keynote speaker, author, professor and co-founder of the Russian Research and Educational Holocaust Centre Ilya Altman, who will give a lecture titled, "The Holocaust in the Soviet Union: Unknown Pages," was the first person in 1989 in the Soviet Union to speak publicly about the Holocaust from an academic perspective.

"That took a lot of bravery for him to do that, and even now, the discussion of the Holocaust in the [former] Soviet Union, is a very controversial issue," Shternshis said.

In addition to lectures, there will also be a screening of Russian filmmaker Mikhail Kalik's Goodbye, Boys!, which will be held March 24 at U of T.

The film, produced in 1964, follows three teenage boys, one of whom is openly Jewish, in the late 1930s.

"In the movie we see images of people wearing striped robes and behind the barbed wire. That was the first time the subject of the Holocaust was brought up in Soviet cinema," Shternshis said.

Because of the references to the Holocaust, the film had a limited release and was rarely shown until the early 1990s. This screening is a Canadian premiere.

A photo exhibit from the Blavatnik Archive Foundation in New York called "Lives of the Great Patriotic War: The Untold Stories of Soviet Jewish Soldiers in the Red Army during World War II," will conclude the conference, but will continue from March 27 to April 4 at Congregation Darchei Noam.

Through wartime memoirs, photographs, and interviews with Red Army veterans – 82 of whom are Russian-Canadians – the exhibit presents the story of the 500,000 Jewish soldiers who fought in the war.

Following the conference, on April 1 at Darchei Noam, Shternshis will take part in a panel discussion titled "Defending Communism or Saving Global Jewry: Legacy of Soviet Jewish Veterans of World War II," which will examine the place of Soviet Jewish veterans, many of whom live in Toronto, in the Canadian Jewish community.

She suspects the panel discussion might "get a little controversial, because it might get away from the historical significance and go into the turbulent waters of modern Jewish politics."

Among the panelists will be Darchei Noam Rabbi Tina Grimberg, World War II veteran Alex Levin and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto president Ted Sokolsky.

McGill club forced to change name of pro-Israel event

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The group McGill Friends of Israel (MFI) had to change the name of its "Israel A-Party" event last week because the university's student union said it constituted "a mockery and/or trivialization of various oppressions some people of the world are subject to on a day-to-day basis."

MFI grudgingly altered the original moniker of its Israel Peace Week event – meant as a play on the term "Israel apartheid" – to "A Party for Israel."

MFI vice-president Russell Sitrit-Leibovich said MFI risked losing its official club status, its funding and its right to organize events on campus if it didn't accede to the demand from the Student Society of McGill University (SSMU).

"It is so hypocritical," Sitrit-Leibovich told The CJN. "You can accuse Israel of apartheid all over campus, but an [SSMU] committee says that we are violating equity policy, that we are being offensive and inflammatory.

"It is absurd. We never disrupt their events."

Israeli Peace Week was organized to counter Israel Apartheid Week (IAW), which is is now held on 75 North American campuses.

The controversy about the "Israel A-Party" name arose after an anonymous complaint was registered with the SSMU's equity committee about the event, which was only publicized on Facebook.

SSMU vice-president Carol Ellen Fraser told MFI president Eliana Schwartz in a pre-event e-mail exchange that while there is nothing wrong with Israel's supporters expressing their opposition to Israel being characterized as an apartheid state, "this does not give them the right to mock and trivialize the term itself, and furthermore imply that Palestinian people are not suffering as a result of injustices in Israel...

"We feel that the title 'Israel A-Party' makes too much light of the convictions and experiences of students such as the claimant of this complaint.

"It is our job to ensure a safer place on campus."

McGill, as it happens, had an "apartheid wall" situated prominently on campus – near the Roddick Gates – during IAW.

Sitrit-Leibovich, a 21-year-old political science student, was also riled because MFI was notified only a few days before the pro-Israel party about the complaint to the SSMU by someone who was unidentified, giving his group little time to respond to or deal with the situation properly.

Schwartz told the SSMU that MFI would change the name of the event "in the interest of the hard work we have put into the event and our desire to maintain good relations with all members of the McGill community, [but] we have serious concerns about the complaint."

MFI, Schwartz wrote, has been treated "inequitably," and "we were not given a chance to make an official response to the complaint before the committee."

She said that the student union "would find it difficult to substantiate a complaint that the event's title oppresses any member of the McGill community in a manner that violates the SSMU equity policy."

As well, she said, there were "no defined complainants," the event was intended as a fundraiser for a charity and it was "supposed to be festive, not overtly political."

She added: "We find it difficult to comprehend the claims of oppression stemming out of an Israel Peace Week event by an organization that actively works toward a just solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict...

"The fact that this complaint has been passed through the SSMU implicitly recognized and affirms the misinformed notion that Israel is an apartheid state."

Sitrit-Leibovich told The CJN that his group was "left with no choice [but to change the event's title]. It is such hypocrisy."

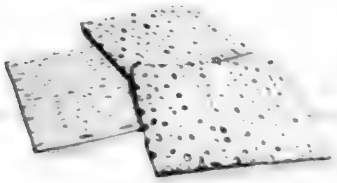
MONTREAL — Pro-Israel students received conflicting messages on what they should be doing on campus to promote the state from Israeli Consul General Joel Lion and National Post columnist Barbara Kay. Lion and Kay were guest speakers at an event sponsored by McGill Friends of Israel, as part of its Israel Peace Week programming, which overlapped with Israeli Apartheid Week.



Passover Food Ideas

New and traditional ideas for meals

As Dry Bones puts it so well (see comic on this page), the big crunch is coming. Yet, preparing for Passover means a lot more than buying matzah.

As we begin to think about Passover, the celebration of ancient Hebrews' liberation from slavery more than 3,000 years ago, our first thought often turns to what we cannot eat during the eight-day festival.

Instead of thinking about what we can't eat, however, our food supplements in the next couple of weeks, should give you a number of suggestions about what we can.

The Passover seder is a time for family traditions, and many cooks are adamant that their families and friends want to eat exactly what they ate last year and the year before, and the year before that. There is always room, though, for fresh ideas, so we've included some of our writers' favourite foods, and perhaps these will become new favourites at your seder table.

We also haven't forgotten that many people search for new lunch and dinner ideas for the entire week. To that end, we offer some lunch recipes, mid-week treat ideas and delicious alternatives to a "typical" meat meal.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a Chag Kasher v'Samayach.

Seder suggestions

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

I am sure that many Jews, if asked what their favourite Jewish holiday is, would immediately answer Passover, and if asked about their favourite holiday meal, the answer would be the seder.

People's lives are demanding and hectic today, and the Passover seder may be one of the few or only times of the year when all the generations sit down together. Sitting at the seder table with family, friends and guests, we relive the story of our exodus from Egypt. We read the Haggadah, discuss, ask questions and sing somewhat silly songs, and we continue the traditions of our forefathers and make new traditions for our children.

Preparing for Passover need not be difficult. Each year, more and more new kosher for Passover products become available. There are many different types of matzah, the store-bought cakes are delicious, new dairy products including low-fat and no-fat are in the supermarkets, and blueberry muffin mixes and pancake mixes are available. Preparing for Passover has never been so easy.

BAKED SALMON WITH BASIL OIL

This dish can easily be doubled or tripled and can be served as a first course for the seder or a main course dinner during the rest of Passover.

4 6-oz. salmon fillets, skin on
1/3 cup olive oil
oil for baking dish
1 cup fresh basil leaves kosher salt and fresh ground pepper
4 sprigs of basil for garnish

Preheat oven to 250. Season the salmon with a few drops of the olive oil and put the fillets on an oil-coated baking dish. Wash and drain the basil leaves and dry them thoroughly. Make a basil oil by pureeing the leaves in a blender with the remaining olive oil until smooth. Season to taste with salt and pepper.

Bake the salmon for 10 minutes. If the skin peels away easily and the salmon flesh flakes when tested with a fork, it is done enough, even though it may not look it. If you prefer it well done, return it to the oven for another 3 minutes. Sprinkle the salmon with salt and pepper. Sprinkle the basil oil lightly over the salmon and serve. Makes 4 servings.

MAIDA HEATTER'S CHOCOLATE WALNUT TORTE

I have never tasted a recipe from Maida Heatter that I didn't love. This rich chocolate sponge nut cake is wonderful! Although the recipe states that it serves 6 to 8, I find that as a seder dessert, after the large meal, it will serve more.

12 large eggs, separated
1 cup sugar
8 oz. semisweet chocolate, melted
8 oz. walnuts, finely ground
pinch of salt
powdered sugar for decoration, optional melted semisweet chocolate for decoration, optional

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl of an electric mixer at high speed, beat the egg yolks with 1/2 cup sugar until well blended, about 2 minutes. Beat in the chocolate and fold in half the nuts. Set aside.

In another bowl, beat the egg whites with the salt until very softly peaked, then gradually beat in the remaining sugar and continue beating until the egg whites hold firm peaks but are not dry. Stir a little of the egg whites into the chocolate mixture, then gently fold in about half the remaining egg whites. Finally, fold in the remaining nuts and the rest of the egg whites. Spoon the mixture into an ungreased 10-in. tube pan. Bake 75 minutes.

Remove the cake from the oven and turn upside down on a rack or suspend, upside down over the neck of a bottle, until completely cooled. Use a knife with a thin, stiff blade to loosen the cake from the pan by running the knife carefully and closely along the sides of the pan. Invert the cake onto a serving plate. It may be dusted with powdered sugar or drizzled with a lacework of melted chocolate. Makes 6-8 servings.

Memories and pickled herring

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

Monty Hall spent 27 years making outrageous deals with anxious contestants on his television game show, Let's Make A Deal. But the sweetest deal he ever made with his family was for a plate of pickled herring if they'd join him for Passover seder.

Such a deal! The odds were all in Monty's favour.

Which of Monty and Marilyn Hall's – she co-compiled The Celebrity Kosher Cookbook: A Sentimental Journey with Food, Mothers and Memories – three children wouldn't want to gather around the large stone dining table to eat and retell the Passover story of the Jewish People's journey from slavery to freedom? Even the real deal-makers of the family – the Halls' five grandchildren – get to put in their two cents.

The youngest child will ask the Four Questions. Hall will set out his silver chalice filled with sweet, kosher wine for Elijah, and everyone will get a taste of the ceremonial foods: bitter herbs to recall the sorrow of slavery, matzah to awaken memories of deprivation, honeyed charoset to taste the sweetness of freedom.

Hall greets visitors in his gracious home, where his Order of Canada medallion bumps up against three honorary doctorates, Israeli artist Reuven Rubin's suite of lithographs titled The Prophets, and a plethora of plaques honouring his charitable works.

Hall picks up the antique chalice that has become Elijah's wine goblet.

When asked which flavour of the sugary sweet wine is his favourite, Hall grins. "After the third cup, I don't care.

"Passover is a time to ask questions. We stop halfway through the service, discuss a topic of interest and everyone joins in. Sometimes it gets heated – about politics, about Israel. The only subject two Jews agree on is what the third person should give to charity," he says wryly.

"We stop the service at different sections: we eat gefilte fish, sweet and sour herring; we read some more; we stop, we eat chicken soup, matzah balls; we sing. The happening goes on for four hours. Our seders are wonderful. I'm big daddy. I am what my grandfather was.

"Every year we host the seder, invite close friends, cousins – there are usually 35 of us. We take in lots of strangers, people who don't have anyplace to go. It's a mitzvah. I can do this," he beams.

Passover memories are precious to Hall, especially now that he's the patriarch. But a very special Passover, when he was only six and his beloved grandfather, David, was the patriarch, is never far from his heart.

Hall grew up in Winnipeg in his grandfather's house. He lived with four generations of family – aunts, uncles, cousins, his grandparents and two sets of great-grandparents.

"It wasn't a big house, and we used every conceivable square inch – four people in one bedroom, three in another," Hall reminisces. "My mother's three young brothers – my uncles – and I slept in the same room. With all those people, we had only one bathroom. That's where you learn patience. I also learned to wait in line." He laughs at the memory.

"More importantly, when you grow up in a house like that, you learn about respect," he adds. "One of the most beautiful sights I remember is sitting at the dining table, watching my aged great-grandfather feeding his wife, who had gone blind," Monty says, still touched.

Hall's grandfather, David Rusen, had arrived in Winnipeg in 1901 from the Pavelich shtetl in Ukraine. He started out with a push-cart, selling fruit and vegetables on the street. He subsequently bought a truck, and then started a wholesale produce company.

By 1906, he had earned enough to bring over his wife and children, his wife's parents and two sets of grandparents (Monty's great-grandparents).

Grandpa David ultimately sponsored not only the rest of their family – aunts, uncles and cousins – but 100 impoverished Jews from their shtetl who wanted a respite from their life in Czarist Russia.

On one particular Pesach, the family was in the middle of the service when the phone rang. It was the stationmaster from the Canadian Pacific Railroad.

"I have this family – they gave me a piece of paper with your number. What do I do with them?" he urgently asked. "Put them in a taxi," Rusen said. And tell the driver to make it quick."

The "family" were cousins who had set foot on the shores of Canada from Ukraine on the first night of Passover, Hall says. "They were sponsored by my grandfather."

"Grandma ordered us all to stop eating. 'We have six more mouths to feed,' she told us.

"There were tears, but they were for joy, as my grandmother began babbling in Ukrainian to these cousins she hadn't seen in 21 years."

Celebrities share favourite Pesach recipes

Fifty years later, Hall was speaking in at a large Hadassah fundraiser. He was retelling the story of how a poor Russian family walked into his grandfather's seder and changed the way he looked at the world.

"After I finished speaking, people began gathering around me," Hall remembers. "One very pretty woman whispered, 'That story sounds familiar. My name is Miriam Margulies. Could we be related?'

"I felt the hair stand up on the back of my neck," said Monty.

"Miriam, didn't you hear the story? There were four children – Kieva, Aaron, Numa and Miriam. Your family crashed our Passover seder.

"We both cried," Hall says, tearing up.

That seder sticks in Hall's mind as one of the defining moments of his life, one where he learned about charity, philanthropy and the line from Fiddler on the Roof – "We all know who we are and what God expects of us."

"That was my grandfather's creed, and mine. My grandfather was like Tevye the Milkman. I guess in my own way, I am too."

MONTY HALL'S SWEET AND SOUR HERRING

Hall learned how to make this recipe from a friend who taught him to filet the fresh fish. As years went by and time became scarce, Hall would make the recipe from matjes herring he would buy in a tin, which was already filleted. This sweet and sour appetizer developed quite a following, as it was the perfect hors d'oeuvres for Passover. One year, he and Alan Alda went to a second-night seder.

"I brought two jars of the herring. We passed the first jar around and – it disappeared," Hall said. "So, apparently, had the second jar. We looked high and low for it. Then I walked into the kitchen and there was Alan, devouring the herring, a guilty look on his face. I've never let him forget it," Hall laughed.

Matjes herring takes one hour to soak. Salt herring might take longer, so talk to the fish man about it.

4 fresh matjes or salt herrings, filleted, or 1 jar of matjes herring, which is what I used
1 large white onion, peeled and thinly sliced
1 cup white wine or apple cider vinegar
1 cup sugar
3 cloves
8 black peppercorns
2 bay leaves
8 juniper berries
1 tbsp. mace leaves
piece of cheesecloth

Soak herring for one hour in cold water. Drain on a few layers of paper towel. Cut into bite-size pieces. In a wide-mouth glass jar, place a layer of herring and a layer of onions. Alternate until you have reached the top. Place spices in a piece of cheesecloth, making sure to secure the ends to make a sack. Place in pan with vinegar, sugar and water to taste and bring to boil. Let it cool. Pour the liquid over the herring. Refrigerate for 2 days before eating. It will stay fresh in the refrigerator for 2 weeks. Serves 6 to 8.

MORLEY AMSTERDAM'S MATZAH SHALET

From Celebrity Kosher Cookbook.

Best-known for his role as a wisecracking television writer on The Dick Van Dyke Show, Amsterdam talks about his mother's penchant for "international delicacies" such as calf brains and eggs, which she loved making for his father's breakfast. One day, Amsterdam overheard her placing an order with the butcher. "Hello, have you got any brains…" She stopped and corrected herself. "I mean, have you got any brains at all?" Amsterdam fell off the couch laughing. His mother couldn't face the butcher for weeks.

This sweet, fruity side dish can be scrambled with eggs for a delicious variation of matzah brie.

2 matzahs, broken into pieces
2 tbsp. oil
1 tbsp. sugar or to taste
1/4 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. raisins
2 tbsp. currants
2 tbsp. almonds, finely chopped
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
1 large apple, peeled and diced
3 egg yolks
3 egg whites, beaten until stiff

Preheat oven to 350. Soak matzahs in cold water to cover. When soft, squeeze dry. Add oil, sugar, salt, raisins, currants, almonds, cinnamon, apples and egg yolks. Stir to combine. Fold in beaten egg whites. Bake in greased 6-in. pudding dish for 45 minutes. Top should be golden brown. Serves 6 to 8.

Cookbook features recipes from grassroots contributors

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

For the more than 40 years that I've been involved with food as a writer, cookbook author and cookbook reviewer, I have maintained that cookbooks created with contributions by individuals were the best cookbooks. Grassroots contributors are creative, resourceful, original, imaginative and inventive.

Many of these books were produced as fundraisers for organizations, as is the case with a cookbook by a 40-year old Chicago Hadassah chapter, B'te Avon III Tasteful Treasures from North Boundary.

Having served as president of the Hadassah region adjacent to the big Chicago chapter, I had the opportunity to know and work with 10 of the women who worked on the book plus one recent new member from Kansas.

It was a great joy to peruse the pages and make notes of recipes I want to try. The three-ring notebook format is functional and user friendly, and the enormous collection makes it an extremely practical book.

This kosher cookbook has an indication next to each recipe of whether it is dairy, meat or pareve. You can order it from bigchapter.chicago@Hadassah.org or from North Boundary Hadassah, 4711 Golf Road, Skokie, IL, 50076.

The following are two Passover recipes.

APPLE SOUFFLÉ

6 large eggs, separated
1 cup sugar
4 tbsp. vegetable oil
juice of 1 lemon
1/2 cup cake meal
6 peeled and sliced apples

Preheat oven to 375. Cream yolks and sugar. Add oil and lemon juice. Add cake meal and apples.

In another bowl, beat egg whites until stiff and fold into apple mixture. Pour into greased soufflé dish or ovenproof baking pan and bake for 45 minutes. Serves 10.

VEGETABLE KUGEL

1/4 cup diced green peppers
1/2 cup diced celery
1 cup diced onions
1 cup grated carrots
6 tbsp. oil
1 package thawed and drained chopped spinach
3 beaten eggs
1/8 tsp. pepper
1/2 tsp. salt
3/4 cup matzah meal

Preheat oven to 350. Sauté the peppers, celery, onions and carrots in oil for 10 minutes. Add and mix by hand the spinach, eggs, pepper, salt and matzah meal. Pour into a greased 8x8-in. pan and bake for 45 minutes until firm, or bake in 12 greased muffin tins for 30 minutes until cooked through. Cool for 10 minutes before removing from tins.

Variation: use a pie pan and cut into wedges.

Golden Recipes inspire daughter

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Naomi Reiter Bruni, 43, is on a cooking mission.

She is trying to cook every recipe in a precious, handwritten cookbook owned previously by her mother, Carol Joy Reiter, who, in her late 60s, has Alzheimer's disease and lives in long-term care.

A law clerk who runs the office of her father, Moishe Reiter, Bruni is married and has two daughters ages 15 and 10.

She discovered the gold-coloured book – she calls it My Golden Recipes – in her mother's kitchen when her mother got sick. "That was in 2009, but I wasn't ready to take the book home until 2011. I had to come to terms with what I call my 'new normal.'"

It's not really a book, she said. "It contains recipes written on recipe cards and scraps of paper, butchers' bills, and lots and lots of side notes.

"I got so excited. I found recipes from my Bubbie Gertie, written in the early 1900s. These are all recipes I thought had been lost with my mother."

When she tries a recipe, she said, she connects with her family. "Someone told me I'm cooking with my mother's hand on my shoulder, and that is exactly it. One recipe has a note from my mother that says, 'Don't worry. It will be delicious'."

Bruni said she was inspired by the book to start a blog called My Mother's Treasure: A Daughter's Journey of Discovery (mymotherstreasures.blogspot.com), which includes recipes, pictures of the food and family photos to show whose recipe it was.

"It started as a Facebook note, and friends reacted so positively, I've turned it into the blog."

Carol Joy Reiter

Bruni said she is preparing her Passover cooking for the seder and throughout the week, with help from her family's book. "My mom always believed that no one should be alone for the holidays, and the seder was always a big deal. She cooked for weeks.

"I'm cooking 'in the box.' I'm sticking with my mother's recipes, and I read her notes as I cook – 'do this, make it this way.'"

BABA ETHEL'S ROASTED POTATOES

10 medium potatoes, peeled and cut into 1-in. pieces
2-3 cooking onions, peeled and cut into 1-in. pieces
1 tsp. garlic powder
1 tsp. onion powder
1 tsp. kosher or sea salt
1 tsp. black pepper
2 tsp. paprika
3 tbsp. oil

Preheat oven to 350. Toss potato and onion pieces with oil and seasonings. Place mixture in parchment-lined roasting pan. Cook, uncovered, for 90 to 120 minutes (depending on how crispy you like your potatoes).

CAROL'S TERRIFIC TSIMMES

8 medium sweet potatoes (peeled, boiled, mashed)
1 package of pitted prunes, halved
1 (19-oz.) can of crushed pineapple in juice
6-8 thin carrots, (cut in rounds)
4 tbsp. brown sugar
1/2 tsp. ginger powder
1/4 tsp. white pepper

In large mixing bowl, combine all ingredients. Place mixture in two 2-litre casseroles, cover and refrigerate. It will keep this way for 48 hours. Bake, covered, for 1 hour at 350 degrees. Then uncover and bake for an additional 30 minutes. Once it is baked, it will keep for 3 to 4 days in the fridge.

CAROL'S CHICKEN SOUP

I hope you enjoy Mom's recipe, as dictated to me some 13 years ago, as much as we do.

2 plump chicken breasts (with bone and skin)
6 cooking onions, whole and peeled (to start)
6 thick carrots, cut into chunks or rounds (whatever you prefer)
4 long celery stalks, cut into chunks
3-4 celery leaves
2 1/2 tbsp. salt (or to taste)

Fill stock pot 2/3 full with cold water. Add cleaned chicken breasts. Cook, covered on high heat until boiling, then reduce to medium-high heat. Skim fat after 15 minutes, and every 3 to 4 minutes thereafter. Wipe down inside edge of stockpot with moistened paper towel. Once water boils clean, add salt, onions, carrots and celery pieces and leaves. Let simmer for 3 hours. Remove the breasts. De-bone and remove skin. Cut the chicken meat "bailik" into smaller pieces and return to soup. Let the soup cool and remove any schmaltz (fatty residue) before reheating. The soup can be kept in the fridge for a week – it gets better with each passing day, or can be frozen.

CAROL'S SPECTACULAR STANDING RIB ROAST

1 standing rib roast (whatever size fits your family) garlic powder
onion powder kosher or sea salt
pepper

Twenty-four hours before you plan on cooking the roast, rinse and pat dry. Place on "x" of plastic wrap. Rub all seasonings into a layer on all sides of the roast, and then tightly wrap with plastic wrap. Refrigerate for 24 hours.

Preheat oven to 350, and place in roasting pan. Cook, uncovered, for 30 minutes per pound. Remove when finished and tent with aluminum foil until ready to slice.

Gaza rockets strike 40 km south of Tel Aviv

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinians in Gaza fired more than 40 rockets at Israel on Monday as the heavy cross-border barrage continued into its fourth day. Two of the rockets exploded near Gedera, just 40 kilometres south of Tel Aviv, and another struck inside the southern city of Ashdod.

One woman sustained minor shrapnel wounds as a result of the strike in Ashdod, and was evacuated to Rehovot's Kaplan Hospital. Store buildings and cars were also damaged in the city.

Most of the rockets fired Monday were either intercepted by Israel's Iron Dome anti-missile system or exploded in open areas.

One rocket exploded in the Eshkol Regional Council and caused minor damage to a building. On Monday afternoon, an IDF spokesperson announced that 37 rockets had exploded in Israeli territory over the course of the day, with seven Iron Dome interceptions since the morning.

The rockets from Gaza were in retaliation for the targeted killing last Friday by Israel of Zuhir al-Qaisi, the leader of Popular Resistance Committee (PRC). He was said to be planning a terror attack on Israel's southern border and was also the mastermind behind the attack last year near Eilat that killed eight Israelis.

On Sunday, a total of 23 missiles were fired at Israel from Gaza, following the 47 fired on Saturday.

Overnight Sunday, the IDF carried out a strike in Gaza that killed two Islamic Jihad militants. Several Palestinians were wounded. One child was killed.

In a separate strike, the IAF killed another Palestinian militant who was launching a rocket toward Israel. The IAF also reported targeting a weapons storage site and five rocket-launching sites in Gaza.

The Home Front Command decided to cancel classes in most Israeli towns near Gaza on Monday, for a second day.

Two Grad-type Katyusha rockets struck Be'er Sheva on Sunday, after the Iron Dome battery that had been protecting it suffered a technical malfunction. One rocket hit an empty school, and the other hit a parked car. Fifteen people were treated for shock, though there were no other casualties.

The rockets and the ball bearings that they ejected hundreds of metres caused heavy damage to buildings and vehicles. Another rocket hit a chicken coop in Moshav Carmia in the Ashkelon Coast Regional Council, causing heavy damage.

Since Friday, at least 110 rockets were fired toward Israel, 43 of which were intercepted by the Iron Dome defence systems. The IAF carried out 23 strikes in the Gaza Strip.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak warned on Sunday that "the current escalation is liable to be lengthy." He said that he plans to have the Iron Dome anti-rocket defense system declared a "national emergency project" in order to expedite the manufacture and deployment of additional batteries. A fourth Iron Dome battery is being prepared for deployment and is expected to be operational within weeks.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of Canada's Centre for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), said he was "encouraged" by the efficacy of the Iron Dome defence apparatus.

Given that it's intended to target and prioritize missiles that threaten populated areas, Iron Dome "seems to have worked exceptionally well. That's encouraging... as there's potential for another escalation [of rocket attacks]," he said.

Fogel said the latest attacks from Gaza need to be considered in the wider context of the situation in the Middle East. He said the "Iran dimension" to this current barrage on Israel also ought to be recognized.

"There has been a pattern that any time Iran contemplated engaging the international community, [attacks on Israel] follow like clockwork," he said referring to Iran's recent agreement to restart talks with the international community, led by the United States, on its nuclear program.

"So it's difficult to think there isn't either some kind of co-ordination or an attempt on the part of groups in Gaza to exploit the international community's attention on the Iran file so they can advance their own positions. So much of this is about jockeying for position and support within Gaza itself," he said.

CIJA said it discussed the situation with federal officials over the weekend and was told Ottawa is monitoring events in Israel.

Reached by The CJN on Monday morning, the prime minister's office had no comment on the situation.

Queries to the department of foreign affairs were not returned by deadline.

Former Mossad chief opposes Israeli strike on Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Former Mossad chief Meir Dagan said that an Israeli strike on Iran would lead to a missile attack on Israel that would have a "devastating impact" on the country, in an interview that aired Sunday on CBS's 60 Minutes.

According to Dagan, an attack would start a regional war. "And wars, you know how they start. You never know how you are ending it," he said.

"I think that Israel will be in a very serious situation for quite a time," he told 60 Minutes reporter Lesley Stahl, when asked about a possible Iranian response to an Israeli attack on Iran's nuclear program.

Dagan also expressed skepticism over the effectiveness of an Israeli attack on Iran's nuclear program to deny Iran nuclear weapons. Unlike what has been reported, according to Dagan, there aren't four

Meir Dagan

Iranian nuclear sites but "dozens."

He said that no military attack could halt the Iranian nuclear project, rather an attack could only serve to delay it.

In his first interview to an American media outlet, Dagan said he did not believe now is the time to attack Iran's nuclear program.

He said the regime in Iran is a rational one. When asked whether Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was rational, Dagan responded that he was.

"Not exactly our rational, but I think he is rational," Dagan said.

Adding that the Iranians' rationality was different from the western way of thinking, he said, "They are considering all the implications of their actions... They will have to pay dearly... and I think the Iranians at this point in time are... very careful on the project," Dagan said. "They are not running..."

Dagan believes that instead of military action the West should concentrate on instigating regime change in Iran. "It's our duty to help anyone who likes to present an open opposition against their regime in Iran," he says.

When asked by 60 Minutes whether Israel had supported the youth groups that held protests across Iran after the last round of Iranian elections, Dagan refused to answer.

He said he trusted the United States and President Barack Obama's resolve to stop the Iranian nuclear program. Obama said, "'The military option is on the table' and he is not going to let Iran become a nuclear state, and from my experience, I usually trust the president of the U.S.

"The issue of Iran armed with a nuclear capability is not an Israeli problem – it's an international problem."

During the interview, Stahl suggested that it seemed he was advocating Israel wait and have the U.S. attack Iran's nuclear sites. Dagan replied: "If I prefer that someone will do it, I always prefer that Americans will do it."

U.S. and Jordan plead with Abbas

From drafts of the letter leaked to the Palestinian media last weekend, it's believed that Abbas will emphasize that the Palestinian Authority was established as a means to move from occupation to an independent Palestinian state. Abbas is expected to blame Netanyahu for depriving the Palestinian Authority of all power.

One draft contains an ultimatum stating that if Israel does not renege on all of its decisions regarding the Palestinian issue since 2000, stop settlement building, release prisoners and recognize two states on the basis of 1967 borders, the Palestinian Authority will demand that international law be fully applied to the West Bank.

This would mean the step-by-step dismantling of the Palestinian Authority and the return of all authority back to Israel. The Palestinians' threat is that Israel would then have to bear the cost of the occupation, including not only the financial cost, but also the political, security and image-related aspects of the occupation.

The letter worries Washington, Amman and Jerusalem.

Jordan's Foreign Minister Nasser Joudah visited Washington earlier this month and met with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. Joudah is also in regular telephone contact with Netanyahu's adviser Isaac Molho on the issue.

On his return from Washington, Joudah immediately travelled to Ramallah, where he passed along a letter from King Abdullah II. According to Israeli officials and western diplomats, both the Jordanians and the Americans are putting heavy pressure on Abbas to shelve the letter, or, at the very least, to soften its tone.

For instance, the Americans and the Jordanians asked Abbas to take out all explicit threats regarding Palestinian steps at the United Nations and even the dismantling of the Palestinian Authority and the transferring of responsibility for the West Bank back to Israel.

Washington and Amman are worried that if the letter is sent, and especially if its harsh tone remains unchanged, it would spell the end of peace negotiations for the near future and increase the likelihood that the Palestinians will take further steps at the UN. The Palestinians are already planning to turn to the Security Council to get a resolution to condemn Israel for its settlements.

Washington fears that delivery of the letter will increase the tension between Jerusalem and Ramallah and will lead to internal Israeli pressure that would cause Netanyahu to take punitive measures, such as withholding tax funds to the Palestinian Authority. Such a scenario could potentially lead to a third intifadah in the West Bank. Netanyahu, for his part, is interested in preventing any possible diplomatic confrontation with the Palestinians so that the international focus does not shift from Iran.

The UN Security Council was to hold its monthly discussion on the Middle East at UN headquarters in New York on Monday, where the situation in Syria and the escalation in Gaza were likely to be major topics. The first meeting of the foreign ministers of the Mideast Quartet – the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia – in six months was set to take place at the end of the Security Council discussion. The meeting was planned at Russia's request and despite American reservations. It was expected that Abbas' threat to send his letter would take centre stage at the meeting.

Earthquake in north

A minor earthquake shook northern Israel. The quake was felt in Metullah, in Kiryat Shmonah and Safed. No injuries or damage were reported. The earthquake, which had a magnitude of 3.7, was reported to be centred in southern Lebanon. In January, an earthquake measuring 3.1 rattled the area around the Sea of Galilee. A month earlier, a quake measuring 4.2 was centred in northern Israel and was felt in Jerusalem. Parts of Israel and the West Bank are on the Syrian-African fault line.

Christians endangered

Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, wrote an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal last week in which he wrote that Israel is the only country in the Middle East that is safe for Christians. Oren compared the suppression of Christian communities in Arab states to the 20th-century expulsion of Jews from these same countries. In his article, Oren cited the continuing violence against Egypt's Coptic Christians, the burning of Iraqi churches, a Saudi ban on Christian worship and the desecration of the Church of the Nativity in the West Bank as instances indicating a threat to Christianity in the Muslim world. He also pointed out that conversion "to Christianity is a capital offence in Iran, where last month Pastor Yousef Nadarkhani was sentenced to death." Oren concludes that the only place in the Middle East where Christians aren't endangered, but are actually flourishing, is in Israel.

Surrogacy

An Israeli court set a legal precedent with its ruling that a woman whose baby was conceived using her eggs in a surrogate mother does not have to adopt her own child. The Tel Aviv Family Court's ruling states that DNA testing can be used to prove maternity. Previously, women had to officially adopt their children from the surrogate. The surrogate birth of twins in the current case was undertaken outside of Israel. Both parents were recognized as the babies' biological parents on the birth certificate issued in the Republic of Georgia, where the surrogate lives. Under Israeli law, the birth mother is the only person considered the mother of a baby, not the egg donor.

Magen David Adom's policy questioned

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA) has not experienced any reductions in contributions from supporters concerned about the reported removal of the red Star of David from some ambulances operating in the West Bank, the organization's national executive-director says.

Contrary to a report in Arutz Sheva, an Israeli news service, "Canadian Jews" are not pulling their donations or even calling his office to question MDA's policy, national executive-director Arnold Rosner said.

Rosner was responding to CJN queries following publication last week of an article in Arutz Sheva that reported a group of Toronto Jews said they would no longer donate to MDA. The group said it was protesting MDA's agreement to remove the organization's Star of David symbol from ambulances it operates in Judea and Samaria.

Arutz Sheva reported that MDA agreed to do so as a condition of joining the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement.

Under a 2005 memorandum of understanding (MoU) between MDA and the Palestinian Red Crescent Society (PRCS), MDA recognized the Palestinian organization as "the authorized national society in the Palestinian territory." It agreed that neither organization would operate "within the jurisdiction of the other society" unless consent was given. MDA also agreed it will have "no chapters outside the internationally recognized borders of the State of Israel" and that both societies would protect their emblems against misuse.

National Union member of Knesset Aryeh Eldad criticized the agreement. He called it a "cowardly capitulation to Arab demands, backed by the International Red Cross." He urged contributors to pull their donations from the MDA and instead support blood banks, hospitals and rescue organizations in Judea and Samaria.

Paul Rotenberg, the Toronto businessman cited in the recent Arutz Sheva article, said that while he applauds the work of CMDA, he questioned why MDA in Israel entered the agreement. The memorandum of understanding restricts its operations in Judea and Samaria and puts its residents in a bind. Israeli police had stopped MDA ambulances on the way to emergencies, telling them they are not entitled to be there, he said. "If you're a pregnant woman in Judea and Samaria and you have to call an ambulance, you have to call the PRCS." Rotenberg said there are documented instances when Palestinian ambulances "were not used for ambulance purposes.

"I myself am not going to donate to MDA and I know other people who won't give donations to MDA," he said. "My suggestion is that MDA should do what it is charged with doing, being the first responder to all Israelis."

Rosner said following publication of the most recent Arutz Sheva article, he had been in contact with head office in Israel and updated on the situation there. MDA had sold ambulances to remote communities in the territories because they were better able to serve local needs. As the ambulances no longer belonged to MDA, the Stars of David were removed, he said.

MDA maintains some ambulances with the traditional red Star of David across the Green Line – the pre-1967 Israeli border – and in recent weeks, these vehicles had responded, along with Red Crescent emergency vehicles, to road accidents, he said.

Following adoption of the memorandum, the International Committee of the Red Cross appointed an official, Par Stenback, to monitor its implementation. In a January 2011 report, Stenback stated, "It is obvious and beyond interpretation that, when signing the MoU, MDA committed itself to cease running ambulances in the occupied Palestinian territory." Stenback acknowledged, however, that interpretation was not shared by MDA.

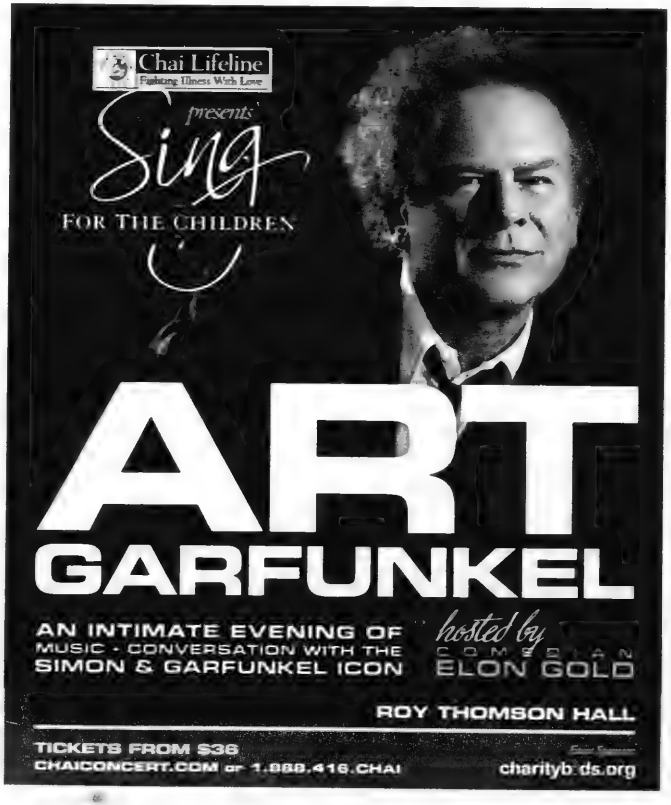
Contacted in Israel, MDA spokesperson Yonatan Yagodovsky said the first aid organization operates 124 stations, 14 of them in Judea and Samaria. The ambulances there, unlike others operated by local councils and communities, are run by MDA and carry the MDA symbol.

MDA provides "equal service to people in Judea and Samaria" as well as those within Israel's pre-1967 borders, he said.

In a video interview with Arutz Sheva, MDA director-general Eli Bin said the organization had finally joined the International Red Cross after trying to do so for 60 years. Negotiations were conducted with the participation of Israel's ministries of health and foreign affairs and with the advice of their legal departments, he said.

Part of the agreement under which MDA joined the Red Cross relates to use of national symbols. Member organizations can use their national symbols only within their own borders, not inside other states, Bin said.

Determining territorial borders is not something MDA is qualified to do. However, Bin added, "MDA continues to operate 14 stations inside Judea and Samaria and will continue to do so forever, with or without an agreement. Period."



Russian opposition gain 'more self-confidence'

Uriel Heilman
JTA

NEW YORK — With Vladimir Putin's re-election as president of Russia pretty much a foregone conclusion, the question facing Russia was never what would result from the election but what would happen after the vote.

Thousands of protesters turned out on March 5 in a Moscow saturated with police and soldiers to protest an election that European observers criticized as unfair due to the Kremlin's domination of Russian media outlets and voter intimidation.

The demonstration was yet another sign that Putin, who took 64 per cent of the March 4 vote, is returning to the helm of a different Russia than the one he left in the hands of his hand-picked successor, Dmitry Medvedev, in 2008. The two swapped roles in what essentially amounted to a power-sharing arrangement between the president and prime minister.

The key turn came in December, when protests against Russian parliamentary elections that month coalesced into a mass movement. Unlike previous attempts at challenging the regime, these protests were not snuffed out immediately by the Kremlin, and their staying power has captured international attention.

They also have divided Russian Jews.

"On the one hand, I have young people coming to me and asking me why aren't you taking part," Moscow Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt told JTA. "On the other hand, I have older-generation Russian Jews coming to me and saying, 'Speak to our children that they should not join the demonstrations.'"

The divide is generational and demographic – between younger, more liberal, freedom-hungry urban Jews who came of age after the fall of the Soviet Union, and older, more conservative Jews from smaller cities and towns who are wary of trading the stability that Putin has brought for a more uncertain future.

Vladimir Putin

In the 12 years since Putin first ascended to power, public antisemitism has been all but silenced in Russia. Jews have not found themselves special targets of the regime and the Jewish community has built strong ties to the Kremlin. While many Jews remain concerned about Putin's Middle East policies – Russia has been more of a hindrance than a help on Iran sanctions and has been supportive of a Syrian regime that has used deadly force to put down protests – they are generally satisfied with how Putin has treated the Jewish community at home.

"Jews lived in Russia by czar, by Stalin, by all situations," said Yuri Kanner, head of the Russian Jewish Congress. "This situation that we have today is the best situation today in Russia in the past 200 to 300 years."

Of course, public criticism of the Kremlin is ill advised in Putin's Russia, and no Jewish community leader interviewed by JTA was willing to go on the record criticizing the regime. But many young Jews were among those turning out in Moscow to protest Putin's re-election.

"We deal with a number of young people who were actually participating in the demonstrations," said Mark Levin, the executive director of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, a Washington-based organization that advocates for the welfare of Jews in the former Soviet Union. "They want a different future. They want a more open and free society. They want greater opportunities. They're much like their counterparts in other countries."

Jewish opposition to Putin is centred more on what his re-election means for Russia than what it might mean for Israel or Jews in particular.

"Every [Jewish] voter has Jewish interests and Russian interests," said Michael Chlenov, secretary general of the Euro-Asian Jewish Congress. "For the Russian interests, there are many complaints, not specifically Jewish – eradication of democracy, anti-Americanism, etc."

The question for Russia going forward is whether Putin will crack down on the demonstrations or whether this newly empowered opposition will be able to wring some concessions from their old-new president.

"There's no map for this. The protesters don't know how he's going to react," said one Jewish observer who lives in Russia and insisted on anonymity.

"There's no question that December was a game changer," the observer said. "This term will be different than previous terms. There's more accountability, people know how to organize, there's more self-confidence in an opposition community whose voice has been heard."

What the opposition lacks is a clear political leader. While analysts said most of the Jewish votes against Putin were cast for independent Mikhail Prokhorov, the billionaire owner of the NBA's New Jersey Nets who has Jewish roots, none of the opposition candidates – including Gennady Zyuganov of the Communist party, Vladimir Zhirinovsky of the nationalist Liberal Democratic party and Sergey Mironov of the Just Russia party – were considered serious threats to Putin.

During the campaign, "the Jewish issue," as Russian Jews call it, hardly emerged at all, welcome news for a community that remains concerned about its safety in a society with a long history of antisemitism and xenophobia. In the end, Zyuganov finished second with 17 per cent of the vote, Prokhorov captured eight per cent and Zhirinovsky had six per cent.

While election monitors highlighted voter irregularities in various parts of the country, their primary criticism wasn't about how the votes were tallied but the inability of opposition candidates to gain any traction because of the Kremlin's near-total control over the Russian media. In addition, Russian voters reported being compelled by their employers to cast votes for Putin.

"The basic question now is – who are going to be the key people in the government?" Goldschmidt said. "People are going to decide how they feel based on these choices."

Experts believe technology will solve world's problems

JAFFA — A team of American high-tech experts arrived in Jaffa on Sunday to discuss their belief that the world is on the threshold of an unprecedented technology revolution that will radically alter our way of life.

Dozens of high-tech professionals and scientists gathered on Sunday at the Peres Center for Peace for the start of a two-day course by Singularity University.

The university is a three-year-old institution based at the Ames Research Center of NASA, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, in California's Silicon Valley. SU has become a place where high-tech capital meets the so-called futurist movement that was an outgrowth of several decades of work on artificial intelligence. The university team was flown in from the American West Coast to present its technological vision to an Israeli audience. One attendee also flew in from Singapore for the course. From the glass facade of the centre's lecture hall, with the breaking waves of the Mediterranean as a backdrop, the team of American futurists, joined by their Israeli counterparts, discussed the future of humanity with an audience of about 40 people.

Singularity can be defined in various ways, but it is first and foremost a concept describing that time in the not-too-distant future – Singularitarians say as early as the middle of this century – when artificial intelligence will supposedly overtake human intelligence and entirely transform the development of the human species. Futurists are promising, for example, that our life spans will be extended by decades or even centuries, that the human brain will be dramatically enhanced with the help of drugs and computers, that computers will make a whole host of decisions for us, and that we will also have an inexhaustible supply of energy. In short, it will be a completely new world.

Peres Center for Peace in Jaffa

Yanki Margalit, who initiated the conference in Jaffa, founded Aladdin Knowledge Systems, a company he sold in 2009. Margalit is an Israeli stalwart of the singularity movement, including belief in the exponential potential of solar energy.

For his part, Salim Ismail, SU's founding executive director, said technology has been the main engine for human progress over recent millennia. Thinking about history, he admitted, was not a major part of the institution.

"In accelerating technology we trust" – this motto, included in Ismail's presentation on Sunday, aptly sums up the university's outlook of technological salvation: a belief in the power of technology's accelerating development to solve the major problems facing humanity, regardless of the way in which society organizes itself or decides to deploy the tools that it has developed.

Web services company puts you in the picture

WALL-E, the lovable childlike robot from the movie of the same name, has a cousin in Toronto. His name is Percy.

Percy is innocent, cute and fully tuned in to the high-tech world of downloadable apps and scientific whiz-bangery. Unlike his more famous Hollywood cyber kin, however, Percy is not a movie star, though he does have a connection to the entertainment industry.

Percy is the front "man" – make that front automaton – for Percy3D, a startup company that bridges the world of Hollywood fantasy and corporate marketing. Founded by Julie Steiner, Percy3D offers consumers and retailers the opportunity to "put yourself in the picture" through personalized 3-D visual effects to send a fun message. "Percy," in fact, is a short form for "personalized."

The company's "video personalization platform" is a downloadable app that permits the user to append a message to a scene from some of Hollywood's most popular films. The clips are only 10 to 12 seconds long, at the end of which you can type in a text message for friends, colleague or business associates.

It's not unlike the flat 2-D video greetings that have been available for years, but Percy3D takes the process one or two steps further by employing real scenes from Hollywood blockbusters licensed from Universal and Paramount studios.

You can have John Belushi, of Animal House vintage, spit out a message on your behalf, or tack on a greeting to a scene from Back to the Future. Other new and classic films that get the three-dimensional treatment include Kong, Hop, Forrest Gump and Despicable Me. Percy3D permits users to create "vanity videos" while adding its own audio to complete the effect.

Percy 3D brings together all of company founder Julie Steiner's interests.

PercyFX, the downloadable and saveable app, is an important component of the company's business, Steiner said. Available at Blackberry App World and the App Store, it features a real 3-D look that's as far from simple 2-D cartoons as today's video games are from Pong.

So far, in only a few months of operation, the company has recorded more than 50,000 downloads to a variety of devices, such as iPads and BlackBerrys. Coming soon are downloads for Android devices and Windows phones.

The app itself is free but customers pay for movie clips – $2.99 for 10 or $4.99 for 20. Once downloaded to your device, "you take possession of the file," Steiner said.

Steiner believes Percy3D is just beginning to gather steam as retailers and film studios see it as another way of monetizing their assets. The business concept brings together social media, movies and technology, items that appeal to today's tech-savvy population. "People like to personalize things," Steiner said. Even when she was a kid, "I got personal licence plates for my bike."

Retailers like it because it's a marketing tool that spreads their brand around while providing a fun application to their customers.

There's lots of potential to further monetize the product by working with retailers to continue developing the items to make it even more attractive to customers, perhaps by adding personalized photo files, she said.

"We're in the beginning stages of pulling different revenue levers," she said.

Steiner came up with the idea for the product in 2008. "It's all about me," she said. "This company brings together all my interests."

Prior to founding Percy3D, Steiner worked as director of strategic accounts for Side Effects Software. Before that she was in sales for the Deluxe Entertainment Services Group, and she's worked in post-production at Sullivan Entertainment, a multimedia company.

When she started pulling together the components of Percy3D in 2008, during the worst part of the economic downturn, she found that raising money was not easy. She did succeed in finding a group of "angel investors" who came through with funds to get the company going. The angels took a piece of the company, and she took the other piece.

"I'm fortunate in that I've got very patient investors," she said.

Looking ahead, Steiner believes she can grow the company by improving PercyFX's profile in the Apple Store. It doesn't take much to get a product placed in the store, but to be on the website's opening page, which everyone sees – that's like hitting a marketing home run. Or, as WALL-E might appreciate, like seeing a green bud sprout from a mass of clutter.

Male haredi employment rises

Hila Weisberg
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Employment among haredi men has increased by seven per cent in the past two years, according to the Bank of Israel.

In 2011, 45 per cent of haredi men had jobs, compared with 38 per cent in 2009, according to the central bank's research department, which processed raw data from the Central Bureau of Statistics.

The figures will appear in the Bank of Israel's annual report, to be published at the end of March. In the meantime the central bank has released excerpts.

Most of the increase occurred in private-sector jobs, mainly in trade and industry. Employment among haredi men in the private sector rose from 18 per cent of all haredi men in 2009 to 24.5 per cent in 2011.

Employment among haredi women hasn't changed much in the past two years – it's stayed at about 60 per cent. The government's target for the proportion of haredi women working by the year 2020 is 63 per cent.

But the report nips any buds of enthusiasm. The 45 per cent employment rate among haredi men has been achieved before, in the 1990s, after which employment among haredi men decreased. By the year 2020, the government aims for 63 per cent of haredi men to work, but unlike the women, they're not even near that goal.

One reason for the increase could be a surge in hiring during the past two years. Another is that donations to yeshivas may have declined in that time, the central bank suggested.

Choosing your signature scent

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

The punctuation mark topping off any outfit is a hint of perfume or cologne. Whether you are heading to the gym or rushing to a dinner date, choosing the right perfume is the finishing touch.

But at an upscale department store, a neighbourhood pharmacy, or a big-box store, the selections at the perfume counters are at once intoxicating and overwhelming. An emotional purchase, perfume not only provides a welcome pick-me-up, it is truly an expression of oneself.

Romantic, sensual and magical are some of the ways to describe the alluring characteristics of perfume, although all scents are formulations of aromatic compounds and scented oils mixed with top-quality alcohol.

Perfumes are the most concentrated forms with a 15 to 30 per cent formulation, providing the strongest fragrance, which lasts up to six hours. Eau de parfum is somewhat lighter with an eight to 15 per cent concentration lasting three to five hours, and the most popular, eau de toilette, has a concentration of four to eight per cent and lasts up to four hours.

In addition, the higher the concentration, the more expensive the product. Standard sizes range from 50 ml, and generally increase in increments of 25 ml to 125 ml.

Divided into several categories, perfumes can be floral based, reflecting classic, romantic overtones, as is the case with the ever-popular Chanel No 5; or fruity with a large proportion of citrus flavouring, as seen in Marc Jacobs Splash.

The green category reflects the freshness of grass and herbs that surround us in Sung by Alfred Sung. The oceanic category takes us closer to the ocean spray, with a clean feel reflected in Davidoff Cool Water Women. Finally, there are the more exotic oriental and spicy categories rooted in musk and the spices of the world such as cinnamon and cardamom.

A classic oriental choice is Yves Saint Laurent Opium and the just-right spice of BCBG Girl. Celebrities including Jennifer Lopez, Britney Spears and Canada's Avril Lavigne, to name just a few, have also joined the mix creating their own signature scents, as have popular retailers such as Gap and Zara.

You need to follow a process to find the right scent. The accepted rule-of-thumb is to try no more than three different scents at a time so as not to overwhelm the olfactory glands. Use the blotter cards available at the counter. Spray a sampling on the card and leave it to settle for about 10 minutes. Then repeat the process with two other choices and re-visit the cards after 10 minutes. The scent will now have the bouquet it was meant to have.

If you prefer to try the scent on your body, apply it from a distance of about five or six inches to pulse points such as behind the ears, the inside of the wrists or the nape of the neck, once again waiting five to 10 minutes before re-visiting the scent. It is important not to apply too much. Take care not to cover one scent with another, and don't apply more than three different scents at a time.

Many of us will settle on one signature scent. However, some women prefer to have at least one option for daytime and one for evening, allowing for a more daring, sultrier choice after nightfall.

Perfumes and eaux de toilette will stay fresh for many years if stored correctly. Make sure to secure caps and keep the perfume out of direct sunlight.

'A wonderful place to relax and rejuvenate'

The WaterSpa at Sir Sam's Inn. [Kathryn Kates photos]

The spa offers hydrotherapy along with many other services.

The WaterSpa at Sir Sam's Inn, on Eagle Lake, sits in the Haliburton Highlands in the heart of Ontario's cottage country.

With three Jewish camps in the vicinity, the resort has been popular with visiting parents for decades.

The current innkeeper, James Orr, has operated the year-round resort and country inn since 1979. He opened the state-of-the-art WaterSpa in December 2005.

"The spa at Sir Sam's Inn is an accompaniment to the rooms. It is not necessarily a spa destination, but a wonderful place to relax and rejuvenate," says Janice Dahms, front-office manager at Sir Sam's Inn & WaterSpa.

There are two full-time wellness therapists at the spa and two on call. In addition to the WaterSpa pool, there is a lounge area overlooking the pool with comfy beds to unwind on, three treatment rooms, a relaxing reception area, an exercise studio and a sauna. Dahms says the spa reflects nature with its blue, green and earth tones.

Male guests are increasing each year.

The therapists use a Hungarian product line called Eminence. All the products are 100 per cent certified organic and all natural. "We always tell our guests that there are no preservative or additives, so you can actually eat the products," she says.

The spa caters to 70 per cent women, with the number of male guests growing each year. The most-requested treatment is the Couples Massage, followed by a choice of body-care treatments, including the Cranberry Pomegranate Sugar Scrub, Champagne Mimosa Sugar Scrub, and the Coconut Sugar Scrub and customized facials.

Spa Life

By Kathryn Kates

Healing stone massage, aromatherapy and other relaxing massages are offered. Also available are body wraps, all with delicious-sounding names – Pear and Green Apple, Cucumber Mint and Mango – hand and foot treatments and reflexology.

"Our WaterSpa pool offers hydrotherapy, mineral water heated to body temperature, so unlike a hot tub, you can spend a lengthy amount of time in it without overheating. Within the pool itself, there is a whole circuit of jets that massage different parts of your body as you travel around the pool circuit," Dahms says.

The circuit includes the Large Bench with two jet formations, one concentrating on the neck and lower back, while the other is a wave of motion the length of the back. The Centre Island ministers to the feet and calves, while the Deck Fountains cascade over the back and neck. The Air Lounge surrounds you with light bubbles. The experience culminates with the Champagne Grotto, which surrounds you with tiny invigorating bubbles.

The inn has 25 intimate lake-view rooms. Eight of them are in the inn, and the rest of the accommodations are on the waterfront. Most feature queen-size beds and wood-burning fireplaces, and some rooms boast of ThermoMasseur baths – air-jet tubs – and walk-out patios.

The main inn, a stone and timber mansion, houses the Twin Fires dining room and wine cellar, a pub, a parlour and recreational space.

"Each season brings its own line of activities, which are all-inclusive when you stay at the inn," Dahms says. "Anything we have on site is included with your guest stay.

"For example, in the summertime, along the waterfront our guests have the use of canoes, kayaks and paddleboats. There's windsurfing, waterskiing, mountain biking, as well as a beautiful beach and outdoor swimming pool. Come wintertime, we offer cross-country skiing and snowmobiling."

The resort will also book activities on behalf of their guests at neighbouring attractions, including dogsledding and skiing at a hill adjacent to the resort.

Publisher has an ideological mission

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Nearly a decade after he founded a publishing company with a strong ideological mission, Howard Rotberg may take his place among that small and proud group of Canadians who operate successful small publishing houses.

Although Mantua Books started off slowly, he says it now publishes one new title each month, and some of its books have sold tens of thousands of copies. Rotberg, a non-practising lawyer who was born in Brantford 60 years ago, named the firm after the city in Italy where his maternal Rappoport ancestors came from.

Howard Rotberg

He says he founded the company to disseminate important ideas meant to save the West, Israel and the Jewish people from ideological and physical assault perpetrated by the many international dictators, terrorists and propagandists in league with fundamentalist Islam.

One popular title — Those That Bless You I Will Bless: Christian Zionism in Historical Perspective, by Canadian history professor Paul Merkley — has been selling like the proverbial hotcakes since it came off the press, Rotberg says.

Another — Delectable Lie, by southern Ontario author Salim Mansur — is a "liberal repudiation of multiculturalism" that combats the morally relative notion that Westerners can't or shouldn't judge other cultures as inferior.

"Mansur came from Bangladesh, from a culture that he found abhorrent, and he loves the culture of liberal democracy that developed in the West," Rotberg says. "He doesn't like to hear people say that it's just one culture that's equal among many."

Iran, with its impetus to develop a nuclear arsenal, is chief among various global forces that seek to destroy Israel and the Jews, he warns. In The Second Catastrophe, a novel he wrote and published in 2003, he raised the possibility that the incessant international clamour against Israel could spark a second Holocaust against the Jews.

Other Mantua titles — such as Hear, O Israel!, David Solway's study of modern anti-Israelism and antisemitism — hammer home similar messages. Leftists and the mainstream liberal-left media may dismiss Mantua as alarmist and "right-wing," but Rotberg asserts the firm is an upholder of traditional Western values at a time when such values have come increasingly under attack.

Many commercial publishers, university presses and media outlets have been caught in the paralyzing grip of post-modernism, political correctness and moral and cultural relativism, he contends. Rotberg established Mantua as a home for writers who, for ideological reasons, were being shunned by mainstream publishing houses. Consequently, the house has attracted a large assortment of writers from many countries.

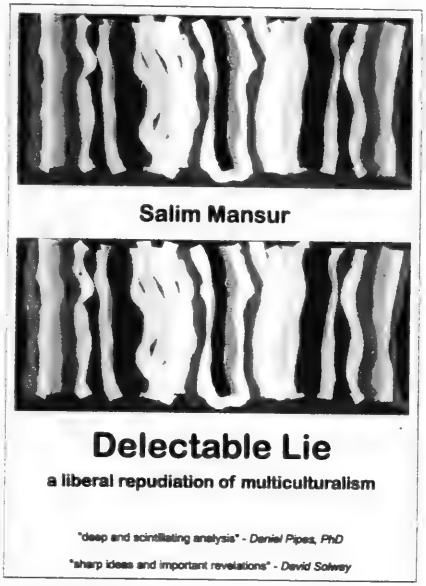
Rotberg grew up in a house where the Holocaust cast a palpable shadow. His father was a Lodz-born survivor of Auschwitz, his mother part of a large family that came to Canada before the war. He earned degrees in history and law from the University of Toronto but returned both in protest after the university allowed Israel Apartheid Week to come into existence. He faults the university for failing to take a moral stand against the "annual anti-Israel hatefest" and notes that it has since spread to campuses worldwide.

After practising law in Kitchener-Waterloo for 20 years, Rotberg sold his practice so he could focus more directly on "tikkun olam," repairing the world, he says. He does this not only by publishing books. The bulk of his time is taken up with converting heritage buildings into affordable rental housing for low-income earners. Each of his projects — book or building — must satisfy a "double bottom-line" criterion, he says; it must turn a profit and improve the world in some way.

These days he maintains residences in British Columbia and Southern Ontario, and divides his time between both locations — which proved handy when he accompanied Israeli author Pamela Peled to speaking engagements in both Vancouver and Toronto last month. A former South African, Peled is the author of For the Love of God and Virgins, a novel that portrays Israel in a positive light. It was published under the Mantua imprint, Miriam's Legacy Publishing.

"It's just a beautiful novel," he enthuses, adding that it conveys a much more wholesome image of Israel than, say, works by "semi-self-hating Israeli" novelists like Amos Oz and David Grossman. "Part of our mandate is to bring out nice novels about Israel like this one. It's a very well written book about the life of a woman living under terrorism."

Jamie Glazov, a Canadian writer living in Los Angeles, has also joined the Mantua family with his recent book, Showdown with Evil: Our Struggle Against Tyranny and Terror. The press is also preparing a work by feminist Phyllis Chesler on the abuse of women in the Arab world. "There's nothing in Islam as a religion that demands the kind of conduct towards women that we're seeing in fundamentalist Islamic nations. We believe it's never politically incorrect to support freedom and understanding. The Torah says 'Justice, justice, thou shalt pursue.' It does not say, 'Tolerance, tolerance, thou shalt pursue.'"



Salim Mansur
Delectable Lie
a liberal repudiation of multiculturalism
"deep and scintillating analysis" - Daniel Pipes, PhD
"sharp ideas and important revelations" - David Solway

Besides his novel, Rotberg is the author of Tolerism: The Ideology Revealed, which complains that the West is much too tolerant of radical Islamist regimes and other cultures that are themselves intolerant. Another Rotberg work is Exploring Vancouverism: The Political Culture of Canada's Lotus Land, an ethical screed that paints Vancouverites as self-centred adherents of an "inauthentic progressivism" that neglects issues of morality and social justice.

It is as an Internet blogger, however, that he has found the greatest number of readers. In a 2011 satirical blog that he wrote for Pyjamas Media, he prognosticated that President Obama will put a hijab on the Statue of Liberty and rename it the Statue of Tolerance. The piece struck a nerve and went viral. "It had the single largest readership of any article I've ever written," he says with a laugh.

As a writer, he's also known the hurt of being targeted at a public reading. Several years ago someone hurled an ugly racial epithet at him at a bookstore reading after wrongly concluding he had painted all Muslims as terrorists. A brief shouting match ensued. Ultimately the store blamed Rotberg, pulled his books from the shelves, and banned any future appearances.

The experience only made him more determined to get Mantua's books out into the world, he says. "You can tell I'm committed to this and that it's a major mission of mine. We're living in potentially tragic times and we have to get out books that can explain to people what, in this age of political correctness, they're no longer being taught in high school."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Judaic artist to speak at Beth Tzedec

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Jerusalem-based artist David Moss is described on the Yale University library website as "arguably the finest living Judaic artist."

He is known for resurrecting the ketubah as an art form, for the limited-edition "Tree of Life" shtender he created with woodworker Noah Greenberg, and for his eponymous "Moss Haggadah," a book originally created as a one-off commissioned work of art.

The Haggadah is now available in three versions, one of which is a limited-edition replica of the original, replete with symbolism, illuminated drawings, gold leaf, moving parts, and intricate paper cuts.

Moss will speak at Beth Tzedec Congregation on March 26 at 7:30 p.m. at a pre-Pesach event titled "Roth and Moss: Old Forms, New Expressions: Ketubah and Haggadah."

"Roth" refers to historian Cecil Roth, who edited many haggadot and also assembled the collection of ketubot at the shul's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum.

Moss, who has no formal art training, traces the beginning of his career to an interest in Hebrew calligraphy that he pursued after graduating from university in the late 1960s, he said in a phone interview from Jerusalem. A friend of his who was a sofer wrote out the aleph bet for him, and he "started copying the letters, and everything grew from that."

A native of Dayton, Ohio, who was born into "a very committed Reform family" in 1946, Moss, in his online resumé, also credits his father – inventor, musician, writer and businessman Jack Moss – for "creative tutelage" from 1946 to 1975.

In addition to his art projects, Moss teaches creativity and "creative problem solving."

A father of four and grandfather of 10, he believes that anyone can learn to be creative. "The proof is that all children are creative. Human beings start by being creative, and school squelches that. It can be revived, or helped along."

David Moss

His daughter, Toronto-based Ariella Moss Peterseil, is assistant director of Camp Ramah in Canada, where he began working in 1999 on special programs. Another daughter, Elyssa Moss Rabinowitz, was one of the three co-founders at Kol HaOt, which runs programs incorporating art and Jewish texts and ideas.

Moss' mission to revive the art of the ketubah began with what he terms a naive question about historic illuminated ketubot.

"I started asking people, 'Who's doing that now?'" He was told the art form – which, he explains, reflects the joy and beauty associated with a wedding – had died out about a century earlier, and that the illuminated manuscripts had been replaced by printed forms that often end up in a drawer.

"It seemed to me a shame that that tradition had died out. I started doing them for friends, and people saw me doing them, and asked me to do their own."

Moss' Judaic background, following the acquisition of a BA in liberal arts, includes three years at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Jewish Theological Seminary, where he was enrolled in the rabbinic program in the late 1960s, although he had no intention of becoming a rabbi.

"I wanted to continue my Jewish education," he said.

After his year in Israel in 1968-1969, he remained mostly in the United States, including a 1974-1977 stint in Berkeley, Calif., where he was artist-in-residence at the Magnes Collection of Jewish Art and Life.

In addition to his evening presentations at Beth Tzedec – one on the revival of the hand-done ketubah and one on the haggadah – Moss will meet with young students at Robbins Hebrew Academy, which has a branch at Beth Tzedec. He said he asked to meet with small groups "so I can sit on the floor and engage them in the artistic process."

There is no charge for the evening presentation, which includes a dessert reception, but attendees are requested to RSVP to Avital at 416-781-3511.

Woody Allen to play pimp

JTA

NEW YORK — Woody Allen will play a pimp who arouses the suspicions of his chassidic neighbors in a movie directed by John Turturro.

Allen is set to co-star in the Fading Gigolo along with Turturro and Sharon Stone, Variety reported.

Turturro and Allen will play friends who spark the suspicions of their chassidic neighbors when they launch a gigolo business. In the film, Allen serves as Turturro's pimp.

Allen, who recently won an Academy Award for screenwriting for Midnight in Paris, rarely appears in other directors' movies. According to Variety, he last appeared in another filmmaker's movie in 2000 with a role in the comedy Picking Up the Pieces and an uncredited cameo in Company Man.

YOUNG THORNHILL PLAYWRIGHT WINS 2011 CANADIAN JEWISH PLAYWRITING COMPETITION

Daniel Karasik

Toronto playwright Daniel Karasik has been named winner of the 2011 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition for his play Haunted.

Karasik, a 25-year-old native of Thornhill who had his first play produced when he was only 16, won out over 19 other submissions from five provinces. Karasik receives a $1,000 prize and his play receives a "Between Stages" public reading at the Miles Nadal JCC on Tuesday, April 10, 8 p.m.

The reading is to be directed by Alisa Palmer and will feature Sascha Cole, Sarah English and Jordan Pettle. The competition is hosted by the Miles Nadal JCC.

Haunted is about a university professor who loses her husband and afterwards becomes romantically involved with her synagogue's young rabbi. Meanwhile, her daughter begins to see her father's ghost. The play, according to a JCC press release, "is about family, desire and spiritual hunger."

Karasik is clearly a rising new talent. His 2010 play The Innocents, which premiered at the Summerworks Theatre Festival, was a mixture of legal thriller and dark comedy.

In Full Light, an earlier piece that he produced for Summerworks, was based on his experience working at a cultural centre in Ghana. It won a prize for outstanding new play, was published in an anthology, and has been translated and performed in Germany. Karasik has also had plays produced in the Rhubarb and Paprika theatre festivals.

Remarkably, Karasik was also named last week as one of 10 finalists for the CBC's short story prize, for a story called Mine. More than 3,750 stories were submitted for consideration. (www.cbc.ca/canadawrites)

The deadline for submissions to the 2012 Playwriting Competition is Tuesday, July 3. 416-924-6211, ext. 606, esthera@mnjcc.org

Filmmaker to Attend Screenings: The Toronto Jewish Film Society presents Divan, a 2003 American-Hungarian-Ukrainian coproduction by New York director Pearl Gluck, who will be present for the screenings. A bittersweet documentary, the film chronicles Gluck's search for a sofa once owned by her great-great-grandfather in Hungary, a quest that unearths more than she bargained for and tackles the big questions of faith, morality and the meaning of family.

Miles Nadal JCC, Al Green Theatre, Sunday, March 25, 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. Individual seats on sale 15 minutes before each screening. $15, $10. 416-924-6211, ext. 606, esthera@mnjcc.org

Dentist cum sculptor 'connects' with the Segal

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Harry Rosen long ago secured his legacy as one of Montreal's leading dental practitioners and teachers.

In his "emeritus" days, the prosthodontist and McGill University professor is ensuring that he will also be remembered as a public artist – the creator of large-scale stone sculptures that adorn institutions around the city.

The 82-year-old Rosen's The Connection, two larger-than-life interlocked human figures, has been installed near the entrance of the Segal Centre for Performing Arts.

Intended to convey our dependence on one another, The Connection is the third sculpture Rosen has donated for permanent viewing. In 2010, The Ascent went up outside the Jewish General Hospital's Lady Davis Institute for Medical Research.

The year before Rosen gave his Little Hercules, a child-like figure hoisting a barbell triumphantly over its head, to the Montreal Children's Hospital.

Rosen hopes The Connection will be equally inspirational. "The message is we need each other. We are social animals – we don't live alone."

The faceless, asexual figures lean slightly inward, as they hold onto each other's shoulders for support.

Interdependence is true of the arts, of which he and wife, Delores, are patrons, as much as any other human endeavour, Rosen said. Artists not only need an audience, but feed off each other as they perform, he said. What's more, the Segal has set itself a mission of bridging communities and cultures through the arts.

"It's a natural fit for us at the Segal," agreed CEO Manon Gauthier. "We talk about the power of communities, of the great things that can happen when people get together... We do, indeed, need one another."

Gauthier added it is an honour for the Segal to receive this gift and for her to meet a man of such vision, yet humility.

Rosen is, in fact, a bit of a lone wolf. He made The Connection last year, working through all seasons, for "thousands, not hundreds, of hours."

The work is not carved from a block, but rather composed of hundreds of flat stones. His "atelier" is in Vaudreuil, in a field behind a welder's shop. His only protection against the elements was a makeshift plastic structure.

After working in stone for decades at his country home in the Laurentians, this has proven to be an ideal arrangement. This is dusty, noisy work, and, in Vaudreuil, there are no neighbours to bother.

The open-ended tent provides the essential ventilation, and the welder was always nearby to solder, piece by piece, the metal armature that provides the frame for the stone duo.

Rosen began working in stone as a hobby 50 years ago, as a break from the reconstruction he performed on a miniature scale in his dental practice. He collected and posed boulders found near his Laurentian getaway with winches and pulleys he devised himself. He built walls and patios, until he started to envision his heavyweight medium's artistic potential.

Today, Rosen has abandoned his clinical white coat for labourer's overalls, goggles and respirator to create sculpture that he describes as melding art and engineering.

It is hard work. The Connection, like the earlier two works, is made from sedimentary rock quarried in Hemmingford that naturally breaks into plate-like pieces. The bigger ones can weigh 40 to 50 pounds. Rosen claims he was never cold, even through the winter.

A robust octogenarian, he hoisted these by hand, grinding them to the desired contours, drilling a hole in each and then lifting them onto the metal frame. Although Rosen says the stones are shaped and balanced to hold together by gravity, he did mortar them together for safety.

The Connection weighs about three tons and is nine feet tall at its highest point.

Harry Rosen with The Connection

The sculpture was trucked to the Segal, encased in a custom-made cage. It arrived around 6 a.m. to minimize disturbance to the area. (That block of Côte Ste. Catherine Road was closed to traffic.)

The caged sculpture was lifted into place by a crane with a 30-foot boom. The siting was not haphazard. Architect George Elbaz was consulted, and the work was lined up in such a way as to complement the strong verticality of the centre's Mies van der Rohe-influenced design.

The Connection is on the terrace to the right of the entrance steps, opposite the stone horned animal's head on the other side, whose provenance seems to be a mystery today.

New doc examines The Age of Anxiety

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Everyone it seems is either afflicted with anxiety or knows someone who is. By age 32, 50 per cent of us can qualify for a diagnosis of anxiety disorder based on the criteria used today.

What has changed? Why such a rise in the diagnosis of anxiety? And has it always been with us?

These are some of the questions examined in The Age of Anxiety, a new film from Emmy Award-winning producer Ric Esther Bienstock and Associated Producers.

It is, of course, normal to be anxious. But when that fear is disassociated from any real or lasting danger, it becomes a sometimes crippling disorder.

The documentary interviews eight people, mostly Torontonians, aged between 12 and 50, who suffer from various degrees of the mental illness. It also seeks expert and differing opinions from six doctors, academics and authors.

The Age of Anxiety suggests that there are two main culprits responsible for the rise in anxiety diagnosis: the pharmaceutical companies and the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM), the "bible" for psychiatrists.

When most doctors, especially busy general practitioners, treat any symptom of anxiety with medication, the pharmaceutical companies obviously stand to gain the most.

The documentary shows how one such company hired a PR firm to blitz the media with alarming "news reports" about the increasing stresses in everyday life.

Diagnosing anxiety disorder is not as easy as doing blood tests and it is very subjective. Today, experts believe, anxiety is being over-diagnosed. It is not uncommon now for someone grieving the loss of a loved one for more than two weeks to be diagnosed with anxiety, when the normal grieving period used to be a year.

Ric Esther Bienstock

"The way things are headed, getting an anti-anxiety prescription will be easier than getting a driver's licence," producer Bienstock says. "That's crazy! I'm getting anxious just thinking about it. Doesn't mean I should get a prescription."

Some experts blame the DSM, now undergoing a revision, which keeps adding definitions for anxiety disorders. Will the broadened criteria for anxiety, prescription happy GPs and a hectic society turn us all into mental health patients?

The Age of Anxiety is an informative and balanced look at what is being called the disease of the 21st century. It has its world premiere on CBC Television's Doc Zone on March 15 at 9 p.m.

Are pharmacetutical companies responsible for large anxiety disorder diagnoses?

Sports celebrities headline Maccabi fundraising event

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Some of Canada's best-known sportscasters, radio and television personalities gathered on behalf of Maccabi Canada last week in a Sports Unplugged fundraising event.

Hosted by Dan Shulman, ESPN's play-by-play commentator for Major League Baseball and the NBA, Sports Unplugged included Michael Landsberg (TSN), Elliotte Friedman (CBC), Steve Simmons (Toronto Sun), Mike Wilner (Blue Jays radio broadcaster), Shi Davidi (Rogers Sportsnet), Gord Kirke (sports lawyer) and Nelson Millman (executive producer for radio at the 2012 Olympics).

The commentators were divided into groups of four and faced off against each other in debates on sports issues – a format similar to TSN's Off the Record, which Landsberg hosts. They discussed the New Orleans Saints' bounty-hunting scandal, the Blue Jays' chances in 2012 and the role of the media in the firing of Maple Leafs coach Ron Wilson.

The highly opinionated personalities presented their views on the issues, but the central message conveyed to the 350 onlookers was that Maccabi Canada is an organization worthy of their support.

Maccabi Canada president Tom Bacher, himself a former softball player at the Maccabiah Games, said that "events like this get our name out there in the community and create the reputation [of Maccabi] as an organization that does things first class."

Spectators paid $200 each for the privilege of attending the event, held at Le Parc in Markham. Altogether, as much as $80,000 was raised, with funds earmarked for Maccabi Canada's "adopt an athlete" program. The money will go to help underwrite the cost of bringing athletes to the 2013 Maccabiah Games in Israel. Funds will help at least 50 athletes attend the competition, Bacher said.

Sports Unplugged is one of several programs on the Maccabi calendar and is slated to become an annual event, Bacher said.

In June, Maccabi Canada will host a picnic and sports challenge at Camp Robin Hood. Other events include a bridge tournament and participation in the Scotiabank Toronto Waterfront Marathon on Oct. 14.

In introducing his fellow panelists, Shulman described his participation in the Pan American Maccabi Games, held over the winter holidays in Sao Paulo, Brazil.

The Pan Am Maccabi attracted athletes from Canada, Brazil, the United States, Australia, Israel, South Africa, Argentina, Venezuela, Chile, Panama and other countries.

Shulman was part of the masters basketball team that won a bronze medal while upsetting the highly favoured Brazilian team on their home court. He raved about his experience at the Games, and in particular, the game versus Brazil, when other Canadian athletes and delegation members crowded into a Brazilian gym to cheer on the Canadians.

"It's a moment that will stay with us for the rest of our lives," he said.

Some of Canada's best known sports personalities headlined Maccabi Canada's "Sports Unplugged" event last week. Jean Béliveau recuperating

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Hockey icon Jean Béliveau, although still tired and weak, is getting better after his Feb. 27 stroke and "has his old sense of humour back," reports a close friend of the hockey legend.

"He is definitely recuperating," said Gary Ulrich, a former Maccabi Canada president. Béliveau led the Canadian team into Ramat Gan stadium as honourary chef de mission at the 1985 Maccabiah Games.

"[His wife] Élise called me last night. The good news is that he has his sense of humour back and there is no paralysis. She told me he's been very, very funny.

"But he's been through a lot. He's lost 30 pounds over the last while and he is, after all, 80.

Ulrich said he has been serving as a "clearing house" for callers and well-wishers who want to send Béliveau get well soon messages.

"He will probably be in the hospital for awhile," Ulrich said.

Béliveau had been admitted to the hospital for the treatment of a serious nosebleed that took days to get under control. Shortly after being discharged, he suffered the stroke. He is being treated at the Montreal General Hospital.

Béliveau has a special place in the hearts of those in the Maccabi movement and the Jewish community in general.

Besides being a stalwart supporter of Maccabiah – he also went in 1997 – Béliveau has been an integral part of Maccabi Canada's fundraising efforts.

In 1996, the organization honoured him with a gala dinner, and in 2008, Béliveau became the first non-Jew inducted into the YM-YWHA Alex Dworkin Montreal Jewish Sports Hall of Fame. Two years earlier, Béliveau had also attended the Hall's inaugural event.

Béliveau came to the Yaldei Developmental Centre in Notre Dame de Grace several years ago to unveil a bus donated through the Montreal Canadiens Children's Foundation, which he helped found.

"There is still only one Jean Béliveau, and if there is a more popular person alive, I do not know who that is," Ulrich said.

Filmmaker aims to make audience 'sick and scared'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Zach Green may produce horror films, but that doesn't mean he likes fear. In fact, he says he generally avoids watching frightening movies.

"I don't like to be scared," he says. "I like scaring people."

But the Toronto native spends his time producing and editing horror films written by Richard Powell. Together, they run Fatal Pictures Inc., which has produced three short films.

The newest one is called Familiar, and it premièred at the Projection Booth cinema in Toronto on March 2, ahead of the screening of the Japanese gore-filled thriller Battle Royale.

Green says the theatre was packed, and there were even some people who came specifically to see Familiar, which he describes as the story of a middle-aged man who suspects the negative impulses plaguing his mind may not be his own.

Although it is a scary movie, Green says it's completely different watching it from behind the camera.

"There's nothing horror about it. I'm watching Richard say 'cut' and everyone laughs," he says. "We're making you think it's real, but really it's the fakest thing ever."

However, the people sitting in the dark cinema shouldn't let their guard down.

"When I [screen] my movies and the person watching it is feeling sick and scared, that's the best thing in the world," he explains – a feat he says he accomplished at the latest première, with audience members gasping at all the right parts.

Green met the second half of Fatal Pictures, Powell, at a private film school in Toronto. Green was studying post-production and Powell focused on production. When Powell was searching for an editor for one of his films, Green applied for the job.

They built such a good rapport in the editing suite that they decided they would continue to work together after they graduated in 2002, he says, adding that they incorporated in 2007.

Green says most people who create short films use the medium as a stepping-stone to eventually make feature films, and he is no exception.

"No one makes short films to continue making short films," he says, explaining that there's no money to be made in that part of the industry.

In 2010, the two men released a movie called Worm, which gives a 20-minute glimpse into the life of a misanthropic high school teacher with a "fragile and increasingly terrifying mental state."

Zach Green

Since its release, Green says they have written a script that expands this peek into a 90-minute real-time feature film following the same character from Worm, creating new situations for him.

Using an established character gives the company a leg-up in terms of finding investments because they can demonstrate previous success acclamations, Green says.

He is passionate about film, and he emphasizes his love of traditional methods. Despite technological advances, he says he prefers shooting on 16-millimetre film, which is an economical alternative to the non-digital theatrical film that an established director like Steven Spielberg might use.

In particular, he says he appreciates that film separates the amateurs from the professionals.

"You aren't going to see a guy who doesn't know how to shoot movies shooting on film," he says, explaining that it costs money for every second the camera is rolling, and thus it takes a lot more expertise.

Although high-definition cameras certainly create a comparable film experience for the average viewers, Green says a good director should be able to know the difference visually. He calls 16-millimetre film gritty and grimy, creating an effect that "can't be matched."

Despite his education and his confidence in his work, he seems rather disillusioned with the Canadian film industry. He says he knows his films are very well done, but blames their lack of widespread success on Canada's lack of involvement in the film industry.

"I get no love from Canada," he says. "Movies aren't made and sold in Canada."

He acknowledges Canadian filmmakers like David Cronenberg, but points out that the Canadians who have found success making movies have had to move to the United States to find funding and investments.

"No one takes risks in Canada, and film is a risky business," he says. "I'll never give up my Canadian passport, but I'd rather be American so I can make money."

He said one of the most crucial aspects of the film-industry game is to get screened at film festivals to generate publicity.

It's especially important because a movie's success comes down to its promotion, he explains, suggesting that a movie should put half its total budget toward advertising.

"If you don't promote, you may as well use your movie as a coaster for your coffee," he says.

Through the experience of working on a number of scary movies, Green says he has come to appreciate the horror genre, even if it hasn't turned him into a fan of fear. In the end, it's all about connecting with the audience.

"If emotions are getting drawn out, whether you're happy, sad, throwing up, whatever," he says, "I created something... and you're getting scared from what I made. I love it."

Tackle problems together

Dear Ella,

Michelle and I have been together for a long time. We've discussed marriage and at this point, we just assume we will always be together, but I can't bring myself to pop the question just yet.

Michelle is very close to her family as I am with mine, but there is a big difference: she shares everything with them. Last week, her mom approached me to discuss an intimate, private problem that should have stayed between us. This was very personal, and my girlfriend metaphorically brought her mother into our bed.

I have spoken to Michelle at great length about her unhealthy dependence on her parents and how it's time for her to distance herself from them if she wants to move on with a new family of her own. She disagrees with me and feels I don't understand because I don't come from a close family. She says you can't have too much love. In fact, I do come from a close family. It's just that we don't speak to or see each other every day, and I choose to solve my problems without my parents' intervention.

As far as I'm concerned, the relationship she has with her family is unhealthy, and last week it became embarrassing. Do I give her an ultimatum to choose them or me? I don't know what to do.

Cut the Cord

Dear Cut the Cord,

It's very important to feel loved and to have a close bond with family. However, at some point, there needs to be a natural break. It's not unusual for a child of over-protective parents to have a difficult time separating. It's possible that Michelle is having a hard time letting go because her parents have always helped solve her problems. The fact that her mother approached you about something so private between the two of you is proof of that. She should have advised her daughter to work it out with you, rather than take over and try to fix things for her little girl.

You have to make Michelle feel secure enough to trust that together you can solve your own problems. Right now, you're like the outsider trying to break in to a sealed bond that has had a lifetime to strengthen. It's up to you to turn the tables. For a relationship to be healthy, there needs to be trust, communication and boundaries.

Did you discuss the inappropriateness of her approaching her mother with such a personal problem? Did you communicate to her how it made you feel? You need to teach Michelle to trust that together you can work out your issues. As her husband-to-be, you're entitled to verbalize your expectations and set boundaries. She needs to know that your loyalty to, and privacy with, each other must take priority. It's the basic foundation for respecting the sanctity of your relationship.

Michelle has to know that she stepped over the line, but at the same time, you have to be patient while she works through this complicated relationship she has with her parents. You both have some serious work ahead, and you may benefit from some professional couples counselling. Only you can decide if you love her enough to help her through this.

After almost 18 months of regular anti-Israeli demonstrations on their block, some shopkeepers St. Denis Street in Montreal say their business is suffering and they are weary, even unnerved, by a situation that has no end in sight.

Coffee-shop chat

I was doing one of the things I love to do when I visit Israel, sit in a coffee shop and either read a newspaper or work on my laptop

The café was part of a well-known Israeli chain, Aroma, but could have been one of many other lovely cafés that serve my favourite beverage, café afuch, which loosely means "upside down." It is a cross between cappuccino and latte, but tastes better than anything I have been able to get in North American coffee shops.

I was typing away, sipping my afuch, when I noticed that next to my table was a larger table where a half a dozen elderly women were having a lively and animated conversation. I could tell from their accents that they were of eastern European origin and could discern the occasional word in Polish or Yiddish. They seemed to be having a grand time and periodically were joined by other friends for a few minutes to exchange personal updates.

As I finished my work and was closing my laptop, one of the women leaned over and said she hoped that their talking had not, using a colloquial phrase, "shook up my brain."

I replied, "Not at all. It sounded like you were having a good and lively visit." I said this in my Hebrew, with its very distinctive American accent.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

The woman's face lit up as she asked me in strongly eastern-European-accented Hebrew, "And where are you from?"

I answered Toronto, which interested one of the other women at the table.

"I have family in Thornhill. Do you know it?" she asked, naming the family. "You know that they have an Israeli coffee shop of the same company where we are drinking our coffee right now?" she asked, to which I answered "yes."

Another woman asked, "From where do you know Hebrew?" to which I gave a short summary of my life, starting with my youth in New York, studies in Scotland, move to Canada, immigration to Israel where I lived for four years and then return to Canada.

Each of the women commented on some part of my historical journey with an "I used to live there" or "I have a family member there."

The woman who started the conversation asked me, "And where do your parents or grandparents come from?" I answered Lithuania, stating the name of the shtetl, to which she said, "I was from Vilna, so we are landsman," with a big smile on her face.

Others in the group named parts of eastern Europe from where they came and related their place of origin to its proximity to or some other relationship to my ancestral home. The primary enquirer was clearly satisfied as she now determined that we had a "connection," something that seems especially powerful to Israeli and Jewish culture.

The quest for human connectivity is universal, and this recent small experience was a repeat of similar interactions I have witnessed over the years on my many trips to Israel the need for people to prove how closely we are all connected, especially among those in their later years.

This is especially the case with those who have experienced the Holocaust, with its goal of dismembering our collective Jewish identity and our common origins, family ties and relationships. I left the coffee shop smiling, with a warm feeling in my heart.

Toulouse murders condemned

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TOULOUSE, France — Israel and the French Jewish community expressed shock Monday over the attack on a Toulouse Jewish school that killed four people and left one seriously wounded.

French prosecutor Michel Valet said Monday that those killed were Jewish studies teacher Jonathan Sandler, 30, and his three-year-old and six-year-old sons. Valet said another child, between eight and 10 years old, was also killed, and a 17-year-old was seriously wounded.

A spokesperson for Israel's foreign ministry, Yigal Palmor, expressed outrage at the killings, which took place on Monday at about 8 a.m. near a synagogue on the campus of the Ozar Hatorah school. "We are following with great shock reports coming from Toulouse, and we trust the French authorities will solve this crime and bring those responsible to justice."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said on Monday that the shooting at the Jewish school is a "despicable murder" and that he's certain French President Nicolas Sarkozy and his government "will do everything in their power to find the murderer, and I promise that Israel will help France in this task."

French Chief Rabbi Gilles Bernheim said he was "horrified" by the attack.

Jonathan Sandler

CRIF, the umbrella Representative Council of French Jewish Institutions, expressed shock over the Toulouse shooting and called on the public to act "with responsibility and restraint" in light of the events.

"We have no doubt that the attack was antisemitic. It is certain. Killing children from close range just because they are Jewish is an unimaginable horror. These are innocent children," said CRIF deputy chairman Meir Habib,.

The Conference of European Rabbis called on the French government to increase security at Jewish institutions.

"We call on the French authorities to take all possible steps to make sure the assailant will be brought to justice," said president Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt.

Israel's chief of staff visits Ottawa

Israel's chief of staff, Lieut.-Gen. Benny Gantz, left, accepts a gift from his Canadian counterpart, Gen. Walt Natynczyk, in Ottawa on March 16 at the end of Gantz's two-day visit to Canada, during which they discussed global security concerns. The Canadian chief of defence staff thanked his Israeli guest for the visit, saying the level of co-operation between the two countries in matters of security is very important, the Israel Defence Forces said in a statement. Aliyah Mega Event

TORONTO — The aliyah-promotion organization Nefesh B'Nefesh, in partnership with Israel's Ministry of Immigrant Absorption and the Jewish Agency, took its message to potential olim in Montreal and Toronto earlier this week. It was part of the "Aliyah Mega Event" series that aims to give "comprehensive aliyah information, guidance and inspiration to potential olim," Nefesh B'Nefesh said. The five-city tour, which included stops in Baltimore, South Florida and New York, featured seminars on topics such as careers in Israel, financial planning, Israeli health care and education, the aliyah process, and aliyah rights and benefits. Nefesh B'Nefesh has helped more than 30,000 Jews move to Israel.

WORLD

Wax Anne Unveiled

BERLIN — Madame Tussauds in Berlin unveiled a wax figure of Anne Frank sitting at her desk, pen in hand, smiling dreamily. The unveiling took place last week amid criticism about including a Holocaust victim at such an unserious location, to Bild Zeitung, Germany's most popular daily, reported. Others say it's appropriate, if information about her life and death is included. The director of the Anne Frank Center in Berlin was at the unveiling and praised the idea of bringing visitors closer to history with such displays.

Suspects Arrested

BAKU — Twenty-two people were arrested in Azerbaijan on suspicion of planning to attack American, Israeli and Jewish targets. The arrests were reportedly announced by the national security ministry, which said the attacks were to be undertaken on behalf of Iran. Among the targeted sites were the U.S. and Israeli embassies, a Jewish Agency facility and an American fast-food eatery. Last month, suspected terrorists with links to Iran and Hezbollah were arrested in Azerbaijan and accused of planning attacks against foreigners in Baku, the capital. In January, at least two men were arrested after planning an attack on two Israeli teachers who were Chabad emissaries at a Jewish school in Baku.

Surgeon Probed

MIAMI — A Jewish plastic surgeon in Miami is under an ethics investigation after commissioning a Jewish punk rock band to write a song about a Jewish teen with a big nose. Dr. Michael Salzhauer, 40, hired the Groggers to write the song and make a music video that encourages plastic surgery in a bid to connect to a younger audience. The American Society of Plastic Surgeons called the promotion "offensive and inappropriate."

'America's Rabbi' Declares Candidacy

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach

NEW YORK — Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, author and media personality, announced his candidacy for a U.S. congressional seat in New Jersey.

Rabbi Boteach announced March 14 that he'll be seeking the Republican nomination in northern New Jersey's 9th congressional district. He had said he was considering a run in the Democratic-leaning district, site of a fierce redistricting-induced Democratic primary battle between two incumbents.

Rabbi Boteach's platform includes support for school vouchers, a flat tax and making marital counselling tax deductible in order to lower the divorce rate. He has criticized what he sees as an excessive Republican focus on sexual issues such as gay marriage.

The rabbi, who was once affiliated with the Chabad movement, calls himself "America's Rabbi." He hosted a show on TLC called Shalom in the Home and is the author of several books, including Kosher Sex, Kosher Adultery, The Kosher Sutra and, most recently, Kosher Jesus.

The latter was condemned as heretical by Rabbi Immanuel Schochet, a Chabad Lubavitch rabbi in Toronto, who said it's "forbidden" for anyone to buy or read it.

Day school tuition waived in Calgary

Newcomers offered three years for free

Rabbi Yisroel Miller

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

While many Jewish families understand the benefits of sending their kids to Hebrew day school, some simply can't afford, or come to terms with, the hefty price tag.

With annual tuition fees averaging more than $13,000 at Toronto schools, parents who choose a Jewish education for their children are often forced to make financial sacrifices.

Rabbi Yisroel Miller, leader of the House of Jacob Mikveh Israel, an Orthodox congregation in Calgary, understands this challenge and has come up with an offer that some might find hard to refuse.

Jewish families who decide to move to Calgary are entitled to three years of free tuition at his congregation's day school. The program was launched last year with recurring ads in The CJN.

The Boston-born Rabbi Miller sees it as a win-win offer.

"We know what rising tuitions are like in larger cities, so we've made an offer that if someone would like to move to Calgary, it's worth it for us to subsidize the tuition for the first three years in order to give them a chance to see if we're for them," he said.

Rabbi Miller, who was spiritual leader of Pittsburgh's Congregation Poale Zedeck for 24 years before joining House of Jacob Mikveh Israel in 2009, explained that since Calgary is Canada's fastest-growing city, he saw an opportunity to increase its Jewish population as well.

Calgary is home to a Jewish community of about 8,500.

The community is served by a Chabad congregation, his own Orthodox shul, a Conservative synagogue, and one Reform temple.

There are also Jewish social service organizations, a Jewish community centre and two Jewish day schools, one of which is housed in the House of Jacob.

The shul's day school serves students from preschool to Grade 9, and tuition runs about $8,000 per year.

Inspired by a song

From the editor's desk...

In the moving 1958 film, Me and the Colonel, Danny Kaye plays the role of S.L. Jacobowsky, a refined, elegant, proper Jew fleeing from the Nazis in the company of an aristocratic, unabashedly antisemitic colonel in the Polish army, played by Curt Jurgens. The two men are reluctant travel companions, thrown together by the cruelty and chaos of the times. The film thoughtfully depicts the evolution of the two men's relationship against the backdrop of their nerve-wracking, harrowing effort to escape capture.

The colonel (Jurgens) is visibly bothered by Jacobowsky's presence. But he becomes especially irritated when his Jewish travel partner hums a certain tune, which, of course, Jacobowsky does constantly throughout the film as a way of relieving the gut-wrenching tension of their predicament.

That tune – Anu banu artza livnot u'lihibanot ba – was one of the rallying cries of the early pioneers who settled in Eretz Yisrael, then British-ruled, mandatory Palestine.

Like most rallying cries, its words were as important as the familiar minor key melody, sung by Jacobowsky in low, comforting tones.

"Anu banu artza (We have come to the Land), livnot (to build) u'lihibanot ba (and be ourselves built as well in the process)." (My unpoetic translation)

The alliteration works well in the original Hebrew, though not too well in English. But the key message was the duality of the benefits of the endeavour: building the land and also building up the strength, character, resolve, of the labourers, and thus the community to which they belong and the new nation they were creating.

While perhaps originally intended as a song of inspiration for the new generation of Jewish farmers tilling the soil, bending their backs under the hot sun, clearing the land of rocks and stumps, draining swamps, planting, sowing and harvesting, the poem's central message clearly also applied to each and every person contributing to the difficult, mundane and exciting, day-to-day travail of creating a new society.

As is the case with all dreams, some of the details of the actual, new society do not quite fit with the details dreamed through the gauze-like filter on the lens of aspiration and hope. The Jewish state is imperfect. But given the military siege under which that new society has developed from the very first days the pioneers sang that song, one can be very proud of what they did build and what their inheritors continue to build.

The young, tiny Jewish state is a work in progress, to be sure. Yet, even so, just six decades after its establishment, the people of Israel are helping change the world for the better in every sphere of human endeavour and challenge, helping enhance the lives of human beings all around the globe.

Take for example, the area of agriculture, which of course harkens conveniently back to the song that the pioneering Jewish farmers sang and that S.L. Jacobowsky hummed to himself, too.

In 1956, then-foreign minister Golda Meir created Israel's Agency for International Development Cooperation, known by its acronym, MASHAV. Since 1957, merely nine years after the declaration of the state, Israel – through MASHAV – has been sharing its agricultural and technological know-how with Third World countries. According to the website, MASHAV has trained close to 270,000 individuals from approximately 132 countries in Israel and abroad.

Between May 15 and 17, Israel will host its 18th international agricultural exhibition. Agritech Israel 2012 will take place in the convention grounds of Tel Aviv. As Israeli reporter Avigayil Kadesh has written, more than 7,000 visitors from some 115 countries are expected to attend the three-day gathering.

Kadesh notes that Agritech is "the go-to event" for representatives from 200 companies and countless prospective customers from North America, South America, Europe, Africa and Asia.

"Out of sheer necessity because of its location in one of the world's most arid regions," Kadesh observes, "Israel's agriculture sector has turned out one advanced solution after another, revolutionizing concepts in irrigation, recycling, crop storage, drought and disease resistance, biological pest control, and purification and reuse of wastewater for the thirsty needs of agriculture."

Most of the rest of the world, therefore, comes to Israel to see, discuss, experience, discover, learn from and possibly buy the latest inventions, discoveries, approaches and ideas for coping with agricultural issues in their own respective locales.

The one part of the world from which very few, if any, participants and onlookers come to Agritech, is the area that might most benefit by doing so: the Middle East. Most of Israel's Mideast neighbours prefer to avert their eyes from the advancements wrought by "the Zionist entity." They might one day change their mind.

First, however, they must change the song they sing from one of destroying their neighbour to building their own society.

IsraAID helps out where others fear to tread

NGO supports rebuilding efforts in Japan, South Sudan

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

IsraAID continues to support the Japanese rebuilding effort after the earthquake and tsunami that last year devastated the country's northeast coast and claimed nearly 16,000 lives.

"We're one of the only foreign NGOs still active and hands-on on the ground. Most other aid agencies have left. They're still providing funding to local Japanese NGOs, but there are barely any western NGOs that are operating like us on the ground," said Shachar Zahavi, the founder and director of IsraAID, an umbrella organization made up of Jewish and Israeli relief groups that provide aid worldwide.

Having returned to Israel from a trip to Japan earlier this month, Shachar said he was encouraged by the progress that has been made since the March 11 disaster.

IsraAID arrived in Japan within four days of the earthquake and tsunami to help clean up damaged homes and buildings, open child safety centres and distribute emergency aid to survivors and displaced people living in shelters.

Zahavi recalled that when the Israeli relief teams first arrived in Japan, the locals were reluctant to trust and accept help from foreigners.

"We learned that with them you really need to build trust," Zahavi said, adding that once one community accepted them, others came around.

Looking beyond the clean-up effort, IsraAID has shifted its focus to helping the countless sufferers of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), a condition brought on by the disaster.

Israeli therapists are stationed in cities, including Natori, Iwanuma, Watari, Yamamoto and Shinchi, to help survivors cope with PTSD and other anxiety issues.

"It's amazing because we've been working in eight towns, and we've had more communities and NGOS and government officials asking us to expand our work into other areas," he said.

"Just this week we got five national Japanese media outlets covering what we're doing. They were amazed that we were still there."

Not content to rest on his laurels, Zahavi said there are plans to expand even further and develop youth leadership programs.

"We'll provide training to youth under 18 in the northern region and provide them with tools to make them social activists in the community and grant them access into the temporary shelters, which is something that is not common," he said.

Israeli therapists train South Sudanese social workers, pictured together, on how to deal with gender-based violence.

Zahavi added that as much as Japan is benefiting from Israeli expertise, the exposure on the world stage is also good for Israel's image.

"It's great for everyone – for them, for Israel, for the Jewish people."

In other news, IsraAID partner organizations are working with the government in the newest African nation, South Sudan, to cope with the high incidence of gender-based violence.

Zahavi explained that since South Sudan declared its independence in July 2011, Israel immediately sought to establish diplomatic ties with the country.

Meanwhile, IsraAID sent a team to distribute relief items to the people living in the outskirts of Juba, the country's capital, who were fleeing the violence in the northern part of the new state.

"There's chaos now because of the war with the Sudanese. It's still not a safe place. There is still chaos. They've got their country, but there's conflict around the oil that is on the border between North and South Sudan. There's violence," Zahavi said.

Despite the instability in the region, IsraAID and its partner organizations such as FIRST (Fast Israeli Rescue & Search Team) and Operation Blessing Israel have moved into the "capacity-building phase" and are currently working with Confident Children Out of Conflict (CCC), a local NGO based in Juba, to facilitate a gender-based violence training program for 30 social workers in the South Sudan.

Rape and violence against Southern Sudanese women is fuelled by decades of conflict and war, as well as cultural practices that undermine women's rights.

Polygamy, wife-beating, minors forced into marriage, abduction of girls and the culture of silence and stigma related to sexual violence is common.

Zahavi said that despite the fact that CCC staff are introduced to new rape cases each day, they simply aren't trained and equipped to help the girls and women who seek support.

The IsraAID initiative began with a 10-day workshop led by three highly skilled and experienced Israeli therapists.

Banking sanction shows stiffer resolve

The conjecture and speculations the past few weeks, some of it rather harrowing and hair-raising, regarding the state of Iran's nuclear weapons industry and possible pre-emptive attacks against it may have had a galvanizing effect on the governments of Europe.

As of last Saturday, the world's largest financial messaging system severed all monetary transactions with Iranian banks that have been targeted by European Union sanctions. As reported by Ha'aretz, "the move is an unprecedented measure that will effectively prevent Iranian institutions from electronically transferring global funds."

The Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication (SWIFT) announced March 15 that the Iranian financial institutions subject to EU sanctions would be removed from the international network as of Saturday, March 17. In effect, the society gave Tehran two days notice to reconsider the implications of its brazen flouting of the international community's concerns over the country's race to build nuclear weapons.

"The new European Council decision, as confirmed by the Belgian Treasury, prohibits companies such as SWIFT to continue to provide specialized financial messaging services to EU-sanctioned Iranian banks," SWIFT announced last week.

White House spokesperson Jay Carney described the decision as being "part of the process of isolating Iran and making clear to the Iranian leadership that there is a price to pay for their intransigence, their refusal to abide by their international obligations, their refusal to adequately reassure the international community that its nuclear intentions are peaceful and non-weapon-related."

Prior to the weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem on Sunday, Israeli Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz assessed the impact of SWIFT's decision in strong, unambiguous terms. "It is a tough blow to Iran's economy and makes the import and export of oil very difficult," he told reporters. "This thing can cause the collapse of the Iranian economy. Is it enough? I don't know. Is it significant and will it affect their endurance? Without a doubt it is a very dramatic step," he added.

It was reported in Israel that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had raised the issue of disconnecting the Iranian banks from the SWIFT system with U.S. President Barack Obama and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper during his visits to Washington and Ottawa two weeks ago.

To the extent that the SWIFT decision owes to the intervention of Obama and Harper as well as to rising worldwide nervousness, we commend and thank the two western leaders for their actions.

Amid opposition concerns of delay, Ottawa said it would act promptly to change the Criminal Code to enable prosecutions of Nazi war criminals. Tory justice minister Ray Hnatyshyn had recently tabled the Deschenes Commisssion report on war criminals living in Canada. He didn't set a deadline for the changes.

'International incident' not Israel's fault

I was surprised to see The CJN blame the Israeli navy for causing "an international incident" when Israeli forces interdicted the Gaza-bound flotilla ship the Mavi Marmara in 2010 to enforce the naval blockade of Gaza ("Netanyahu, Harper bask in friendship," March 8). To recall, when Israeli forces tried to peacefully board the Marmara, extremists surrounded the soldiers and beat them with metal poles, rods, and chairs, stabbing them with knives, and throwing firebombs, stun grenades, and even one Israeli soldier was thrown over the side of the ship. Some of the radicals grabbed pistols from the Israel Defence Forces soldiers and opened fire. As a result, seven IDF soldiers were injured, and nine of the anti-Israel passengers were killed. The "activists" had premeditated violent intentions as evidenced by the dangerous cargo they brought on the ship including: Molotov cocktails, slingshots, and other makeshift items that were fashioned for use as weaponry in a planned attack against Israeli forces. It should also be noted that the blockade is internationally recognized as a necessary and legal method to prevent the smuggling of deadly rockets and weapons to Palestinian terrorists. That this reference appeared in a front-page article about the historic visit by Israel's prime minister to Canada was most unfortunate. As an avid reader of The CJN's stellar news coverage and informative commentary pages, I expected more from Canada's Jewish paper of record.

Bialik's technology program

Two stories about special projects in a number of schools were published in The CJN's Live & Learn supplement (March 8), and neither article mentioned Bialik Hebrew Day School. Many innovative programs take place at Bialik. Our students are regularly engaged in environmental activities and causes, and are aware of the power they have in positively affecting environmental change. Students are currently participating in an international collaborative project for which they planted tulip and daffodil bulbs, tracked their growth and reported on environmental changes and their effects on the flowers. They then shared their findings in a teacher-supervised chat room with their peers at HaShalom Yitzchak Rabin School in Jerusalem. Students there studied the growth of their own flowers and shared their experiences with our students. The project teaches students about global environmental issues, while exposing them in a safe environment to mediums that allow them to communicate online with students around the world.

This project exemplifies Bialik's technology program, which seeks to put 21st-century technology directly into the hands of students in a way that enhances their regular learning. In addition to SmartBoards in each classroom, Bialik students have access to two iPad carts, two laptop carts, two computer labs and, beginning in September, a one-to-one laptop program that will be implemented throughout our senior division (grades 6 to 8) by the start of the 2014 school year. Bialik students are encouraged to use video cameras and smartphones, in controlled and appropriate settings, as part of a unit on screenplays and digital literacy.

His duty was to referee

I was a referee at an Israel Football League game at Kraft Stadium in Jerusalem on March 11, when the Be'er Sheva Black Swarm played against the Jerusalem Kings. IFL games usually start at 8 p.m. This one began at 10 p.m. The game was originally scheduled to be hosted by Be'er Sheva but was cancelled, as the IFL did not want to include incoming rocket activity as part of the half-time intermission. When we are at war, all civilians must do their duty – mine was to help make sure that this game had the requisite five officials. It was a hard-fought match, and the Jerusalem Kings won 20-14. I was pleased to have been part of a solution that allowed the Be'er Sheva team to play one of Israel's favourite sports in a secure situation.

What a war with Iran would mean

Barry Rubin

Israel's civil defence forces recently held a rescue-and-evacuation exercise at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem to prepare for a mass attack with unconventional weaponry. [Flash90 photo]

It is quite right to be worried and hesitant about entering into a war with Iran. War, as recent events in Iraq and Afghanistan show, is a dangerous, bloody and often dirty mess in which things go wrong, civilians are killed inadvertently, your own side loses people, and goals are not necessarily achieved.

Sometimes war is necessary. That was clearly true in Afghanistan in 2001, but less clear regarding Iraq in 2003. What are the goals? How are they to be gained? In what way can a war be brought to an end? How is victory defined? These are all serious issues.

Regarding a war with Iran, all of the above are especially true. Iran is a large country with almost 80 million people. A sizeable portion of that population – the ones with the guns – is ideologically fanatical. The idea that a few planes will drop bombs and return home, and victory can be declared, is naive.

Once begun, such a conflict will go on for many years and take unexpected turns. Iran's regime would become desperate, vengeful and – concluding that it had nothing to lose – all the more determined to obtain nuclear weapons and far more likely to use them. Understanding that factor might not deter an attack completely, but it should be very much taken into consideration in assessing what to do.

At any rate, while war with Iran might be eventually inevitable and necessary, that's not true at this moment, when Iran is far from being able to build nuclear weapons, much less deliver them on missiles. And such an operation genuinely does pose serious problems for Israel, and also, even if it does not participate directly in any way, for the United States.

On the positive side, not a single Arab state would lift a finger to help Iran. The moderates would be happy that Israel bombed Iranian nuclear facilities, hope it succeeded, and demand that the United States keep them out of any fighting. The radical Sunni Islamists would worry about the precedent and spread some propaganda, but they view the Iranian regime as a rival, not a brother. The Turkish regime would foam at the mouth, but do nothing, while the Syrian regime, which is allied with Iran, is too preoccupied by a civil war and fears a confrontation with Israel.

Hamas is happy to take Iran's money, but is now pretty much a client of Egypt. It might want to start its own war with Israel, but it doesn't want to risk everything to defend Iran. But the Palestinian Resistance Committees and Palestinian Islamic Jihad will fire rockets at Israel while trying to attack in other ways. Up to a point, Hamas will stand aside and let them do so.

The most serious organized force on which Iran could depend would be Hezbollah in Lebanon.

It is likely that Hezbollah would fire rockets against Israel and mount some cross-border raids. The question is whether Hezbollah would mount an all-out campaign, as it did in 2006, or merely stick to a symbolic demonstration of loyalty to Iran. There are also Iranian forces in Lebanon that would be more energetic.

The large UNIFIL force that's supposed to block Hezbollah from staging a military build-up in southern Lebanon and attacking Israel will be useless. Yet Israeli defensive operations could end up accidentally killing UNIFIL soldiers.

'Regarding a war with Iran, the idea that a few planes will drop bombs and return home, and victory can be declared, is naive'

Finally, Iranian assets would stage terrorist attacks on Israelis and Jews all over the world. The number of attacks might be limited. The question is whether one or some would succeed in inflicting many casualties.

Still, Hezbollah plus terror attacks is not a price too high for Israel to pay for ending – if that indeed can be accomplished – an Iranian nuclear threat.

The picture on the U.S. side is much more complex and worrisome.

In two ways, the U.S. situation would resemble that of Israel. No country other than Iran would hit at America or Americans. Terrorism would be a problem. The rest of the story would depend on decisions made by Iran's government and also by its local commanders.

Ostensibly, the attack on Iran would come from Israel. But even if the United States does nothing overt, President Barack Obama's recent speech to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee is enough to associate America with the operation.

Iran has some choice. It could decide to try to avoid confrontation with the United States. Still, while Tehran's decision could go either way, the worldview of that country's rulers means they're unlikely to make a calm, cool assessment along those lines. For them, America is the Great Satan, the Islamist revolution's nemesis and Israel's patron. Would Iran's leaders really say, "Yes, let's be smart" and keep the battle confined to Israel, using America's reluctance to fight as a way to keep that superpower out of the war?

Again, that might be how western armchair strategists expect Iran to act, but it's hard to believe that's what would happen. Moreover, local commanders of either military and naval units or terrorist cells, irrationally confident of an Allah-granted victory, would not easily give up a chance to wage the ultimate jihad. Then, too, Iran's inability to hit Israel would set off frustration, leading to attacks on Americans.

U.S. forces and facilities are more accessible than those of Israel. This could include terrorist attacks in Lebanon, Iraq, Saudi Arabia and the smaller Gulf Arab states against any available American civilians, institutions, or soldiers. And the biggest front of all might be the Persian Gulf itself. Would small Iranian boats stage suicide operations to hit tankers or try to block traffic?

As happened in the latter phase of the Iran-Iraq war in the late 1980s, the Gulf Arab states would likely ask the United States, European countries, and NATO to convoy their tankers. A shooting war could lead to the dragging of the United States into a military conflict with Iran. Whatever happened on the ground (and water), the price of oil would skyrocket.

These factors also affect Israeli interests, since Israel would be blamed for the resulting carnage and disruptions. Antisemitism would increase, and a lot of people would claim that Israel dragged America into an unnecessary war. Promises of quick, easy victory, the disappearance of any Iranian nuclear capability or threat, and even the fall of the Iranian regime would prove false, stirring bitter controversy.

There are, then, major dangers and real strategic problems in any campaign to attack Iranian nuclear installations that require serious thought and a rejection of recklessness. A war with Iran, if conducted at all, should only happen when it seems otherwise unavoidable. And that is far from true this year.

But that day will come, and people had better be psychologically ready for it.

Rabbi Plaut's Torah commentary

When I began writing this column some years ago, I was on the same page – literally – as Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut. It was a daunting prospect. Not that I ever met Rabbi Plaut, although I knew of him well from my days at Canadian Jewish Congress. But knowing my contribution would appear next to his column and compared by readers to his words was, to say the least, enough to make one weigh every letter put down on paper.

In the wake of the many obituaries of Rabbi Plaut, what more can we say except that we, Canadians of all religions, have lost a unique individual: one known not just for his scholarship and forceful voice within the Jewish community and within Reform Jewry, but in our nation.

Given the tensions arising today from the need to find a way to live together, we need voices like that of Rabbi Plaut, who not only led his congregations but also took on the task of leading the way in creating a truly multicultural country.

As with thousands of others, our home has his most famous works on our bookshelves. His Torah commentary, as one obit noted, has an entirely different voice than the old and widely used Hertz commentary. Hertz wrote at a particular time in history, one in which antisemitism was rife and the Holocaust on the horizon. While truly scholarly, it is often apologetic. Rabbi Plaut was not apologetic.

As my tribute to this great man, I quote from his introduction to The Torah: A Modern Commentary. The words illustrate his scholarship, which encompassed Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform approaches to the Bible, as well as literature and philosophy of many hues. Agree with him or not, his faith in the essentials of Judaism brought into our homes a unique perspective.

Jean M. Gerber

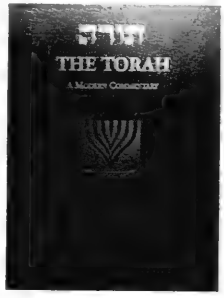
in Vancouver

On myth and legend:

"The contemporary reader familiar with the history and nature of the text will have to remember that a literal understanding of the Torah may lead to grave misconceptions.

"Even the ancient Jewish sages, who believed that the Torah was a divinely authored book, did not take the text literally. They... always looked behind the flat literal meaning. They realized that the Bible... abounded in subtle metaphors and allusions, that it used word plays and other literary devices, that it sometimes spoke satirically, and that its poetry could not be subjected to a simple approach...

"The reader must further understand that the Torah contains a great variety of material: laws, narratives, history, folk tales... and, especially in the early parts of Genesis, myths and legends. By myth, we understand a tale involving human beings and divine powers, a tale which was meant and understood as having happened and which by its existence expressed... important aspects of existence...



"The reader of the Bible should not however, be misled into dismissing myth or legend as irrelevant. What usually passes for history is not an accurate scientific recording of events but an interpretation [my italic] of such events – assuming that one knows what the event "really" was. The best of modern historians is an interpreter, selective summarizer, commentator and often philosopher who brings a point of view to the material.... For what people believe their past to mean assumes a dynamic of its own; the experience itself becomes creative.

"[The Torah] may be said to mirror the collective memory of our ancestors, and in the course of centuries this record became a source of truth for the Children of Israel. The reader will therefore do well to keep in mind that the Torah not only speaks of history but has made history by helping to shape human thought."

For example, is the Song of Songs, Shir HaShirim, an erotic love poem or an allegory of the love between Israel and God? Surely one does not negate the other, but each enriches our understanding of the many modes of love.

Or can we prove the truth of the Exodus story, the founding story of the Jewish people? Again, the wrong question. Rather, we celebrate the seminal moment that is the foundation of an ethical system that we uphold and cherish today.

His conclusion: "The origins of the Torah are one thing, its life through the centuries another, and its ability to speak to us today yet a third."

Some thoughts on commitment

What does it mean today to commit to a person or a mission?

When a couple gets married, are they supposed to be making an everlasting commitment to each other? I wonder what is in the vows made. I no longer see absolute or even determined pledges in these self-styled vows. Do the individuals even expect a commitment that knows no end?

In fact, is marriage supposed to be this type of "'til death do us part" pledge? How deep and long-lasting is the marriage vow? One could argue that as we have extended our lifespans, it's no longer reasonable to expect marriages to last. Additionally, as long as we practise divorce, marriage is not a terminal sentence. But at what point do we avail ourselves of the emergency exit? If the marriage is intolerable, by all means get out. But if it gets inconvenient, are you going to bail? What level of pledge do we expect from the beginning?

I'm walking down this road not because of any recent divorce events or thoughts, but rather because of the opposite.

People have been remarking on my strength and commitment since my husband's stroke, and I've been shocked by their observations. I see nothing noteworthy in my actions, merely my common commitment to the man I married. Our marital vows included anything that may come our way. We were united together. This was it for both of us. We often wondered about our inability to state why we loved. There was no "because of this or that I love you." The love was unconditional (hence unending). So if good came or bad, if something was removed or a burden added, the love did not end.

This led me to think about the Israelite declaration of "Na'aseh v'nishmah" – "We will do and we will listen." Some translate this more smoothly as "we will faithfully obey." But that loses some of the immediacy of the open declaration. We will do! The details of the laws, the intricacies of the contract to which we are obligated we will hear later. But right now, we are committed to this God, to this relationship. Right now, we are here.

Some of the commentators and teachers marvel at this level of commitment. Is this declaration noteworthy or to be expected?

Think of what the Israelites had just gone through – the Exodus. They had just experienced the might of God delivering them out of Egypt and then appearing in amazing awesomeness at Sinai. What could be more compelling? Of course, they will accept God and the words of God. Of course they will commit at that moment to anything. But is that a deep and long-term commitment? Will that be enough to bind Israel for all generations? Is that the marriage contract God desires?

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

We stand now before Passover, getting ready for one of the most overwhelming holidays of our tradition. It is now that we celebrate that show of God's power and authority. It is here that we see God's redeeming hand. Passover gets us ready to stand at Sinai on Shavuot, to stand under the chupah and say, "We do. Na'aseh v'nishmah: We will do and we will listen."

Are we ready to make that commitment? What does it take?

As Jews, it has taken generations of sacrifice and pledges. In numerous and often onerous ways, we have forged identities and commitments to remain as Jews, wedded to an identity in all sorts of conditions. Many look and feel very different, yet somehow have contributed to this vibrant marriage.

On Passover, we state that we were all there, each one of us, being personally redeemed, each one of us personally making that commitment. I will do, and I will listen. I will faithfully obey.

In marriage, both personal and communal, we accept this covenant not because we have no other options, but because we love. This is how I understand that Israelite response, in the context of my own marriage. Their immediate reaction was not one of imposed awe, but of precious awe. They loved, therefore they responded with an outcry of "We are here, we will do. The details can follow."

Out of this level of love and commitment all generations to come are dedicated, and all generations to come are present. That's the natural outcome of a committed, loving relationship.

Russia maintains its alliance with Syria

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Speaking to a group of six international newspaper editors on the eve of his re-election as Russia's president, Vladimir Putin said, "We don't have a special relationship with Syria."

Putin's claim was, to say the least, disingenuous.

Throughout an increasingly violent uprising in Syria, which erupted a year ago this month, Russia has been one of Syria's staunchest allies. Russia – the world's largest oil producer – has defended President Bashar Assad's dictatorial regime and replenished his armoury, thereby stiffening his resolve to hang on despite repeated calls for his resignation.

But in the spirit of bringing about national reconciliation in Syria, Russia has called for a ceasefire and urged the Syrian government to implement reforms.

Indeed, Russia's outgoing president, Dmitry Medvedev, issued a blunt warning a few months ago, saying the Syrian leadership would "have to go" if it failed to reform the autocratic political system. Beyond this rhetoric, however, Russia has thrown Syria, internationally maligned and isolated, a lifeline.

Having accused anti-Assad western powers of hewing to a double standard, Putin has charged they have pressured Syria to pull back its forces from battle zones without having correspondingly asked rebel fighters to lay down their arms. In addition, Putin has described demands for Assad's ouster as blatant interference in Syria's internal affairs and an unwarranted challenge to its sovereignty.

Turkey's president, Abdullah Gul, whose country once had close bonds with Syria but now openly supports the rebels, recently predicted that Russia would soon grow weary of supporting Syria and join efforts to call for Assad's removal. As Gul put it, "I think in time Russia will see its support has been abused by the Syrian regime. They will recognize this fact when they see the heavy weapons being used against the people in Syria. That is not very tolerable, not even for Russia."

Moscow may already be paying heed to such criticism, having signed a recent UN Security Council statement deploring the humanitarian crisis in the city of Homs, one of whose neighbourhoods was indiscriminately bombarded by the Syrian army.

Yet on the day Russia agreed to sign this statement, it voted against a UN Human Rights Council resolution condemning Syria for committing crimes against humanity. In addition, Russia boycotted a Friends of Syria conference in Tunis critical of the Syrian government. More to the point, Russia, along with China, has vetoed two UN Security Council resolutions concerning Syria.

On Oct. 5, 2011, Russia objected to what would have been the first legally binding resolution since the eruption of the Syrian rebellion, the bloodiest of the Arab Spring.

The final draft, watered down by sponsors Britain and France to avoid a Russian or Chinese veto, was fairly toothless. It condemned "continued grave and systematic human rights violations and the use of force against civilians by the Syrian authorities" and urged all states "to exercise vigilance and restraint" before supplying weapons to Syria."

Nonetheless, Russia's UN ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, found it objectionable, claiming it was based on "a philosophy of confrontation" and contained "an ultimatum of sanctions."

On Feb. 4, Russia scuttled another relatively innocuous Security Council resolution, this one based on an Arab League plan urging Assad to resign and cede power to his vice-president and a unity government.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow had no alternative but to veto this resolution because it absolved the Syrian opposition of responsibility for the ongoing violence and unrealistically demanded the return of Syrian troops back to their barracks.

On Feb. 17, Russia voted against a non-binding UN General Assembly resolution endorsing the Arab League plan, characterizing it as an attempt "to isolate" Syria and "impose an external formula for a political settlement."

It passed by a margin of 137-12, with 17 abstentions, underscoring Russia's isolation on this issue.

Russia objected to all three resolutions, particularly the first two, claiming they would be misused to foster regime change in Damascus.

Last year, with a civil war raging in Libya, Russia agreed not to veto a UN Security Council resolution calling for a no-fly zone there to protect civilians. When western powers – the United States, France, Britain and Canada – used the resolution to justify air strikes in Libya with the aim of unseating Moammar Gadhafi, a long-standing Russian ally and arms buyer, Russia felt both deceived and betrayed.

"We don't want a repeat of what's happened in Libya," Putin said recently by way of clarifying Russia's stance on Syria.

Vladimir Putin

Having been stung by western prevarications in Libya, Russia insists that the crisis in Syria must be resolved through internal political dialogue and without foreign intervention.

Charging the West is stoking conflict in Syria by arming the rebels, an assertion yet to be verified, Moscow recently issued a tart warning suggesting that western meddling may trigger "a very big war" that could spill beyond the borders of the Middle East.

By supporting Assad, albeit with reservations, Russia hopes to achieve several overlapping objectives: prop up an old friend from Soviet times, contain western influence in Syria and project power in a region fairly close to its southern border.

Although Russia's political and military relationship with Syria remains substantial today, it reached its apex during the Cold War era from the 1960s onward.

On the eve of the Six Day War, the then Soviet Union circulated a false report asserting Israel was massing forces on the Syrian border, prompting Egypt to send troops to the Sinai Peninsula and expel a UN peacekeeping force from Sinai and the Gaza Strip. Soviet fear-mongering heightened tensions and was a contributory cause of the 1967 war, during which Moscow severed diplomatic relations with Israel.

With Syria having been defeated and the Golan Heights having been captured by Israel, Moscow resupplied the Syrian armed forces with a fresh batch of sophisticated weaponry. Soviet support for Syria was just as unwavering during the Yom Kippur War.

Moscow re-established formal ties with Israel before the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, but retained a foothold in Syria. Russia, at present, maintains a naval base in the Syrian port of Tartus, the only one outside its borders, and retains its status as Syria's single most important source of weapons and munitions.

Under Israeli pressure, Moscow in 2009 halted plans to sell MIG-31 fighter jets to Syria. Otherwise, Russia has rejected Israeli overtures to stop the sale of advanced weapon systems – missiles and air-defence batteries – to Syria. With more than two million Russians working in armaments industries, Russia is likely to continue selling weapons to Syria.

Russia's alliance with Syria sometimes produces bizarre results. Recently, Medvedev bestowed the prestigious Pushkin Medal on a Syrian writer/poet who has publicly praised the Arab terrorist attacks on the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, and has voiced antisemitic views, such as comparing Jews with William Shakespeare's villain, Shylock.

Israeli-Druze diplomat visits Canada

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Diversity in Israel's diplomatic corps has come a long way.

So it was no surprise to learn last week that the director of the department for religious affairs in the Foreign Ministry, Bahij Mansour, a Druze, was in Canada beseeching Christian groups to stay strong in their support of Israel.

Mansour, 56, served 16 years in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and is the country's former ambassador to Angola. He was in Toronto last week spreading a message of pro-Israel activism to the Canadian churchgoing community. He also is trying to drum up more co-operation between the Vatican and the Holy Land, he said.

"The Christian communities in the Middle East are staying quiet" in the face of tyranny and trying not to make waves, Mansour said, referring to the current strife in Syria and the growing power of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt.

"This is a bad tactic, in my opinion. Why? Since 2007, more than two million Christians have fled the region," he said.

That exodus, he said, leaves more room for radical Islamists to overrun and supplant historical Christian sites and neighbourhoods, which weakens the fabric of the region.

Bahij Mansour

Mansour said that as a Druze he sympathizes with both the Jewish and Christian communities because his people have also been "persecuted" by Muslims.

"The Sunni and the Shia both call the Druze traitors, because we believe there were other prophets after Muhammad," a position that is considered heretical according to radical Islam, which considers Muhammad the final prophet.

In his role as director of religious affairs, Mansour said he comes into contact with all religious groups in Israel, and he identifies as an Israeli first and then as a Druze.

Asked how it feels to be a minority in a Jewish state, Mansour was unequivocal in his response.

"We share the country and our lives with all the Jewish people in Israel," he said. "We are aware of the Jewish destiny and many events have happened to put the Druze and the Jews on the same side. We are comfortable living in a Jewish state."

He said while the Druze represent just slightly more than one per cent of the total Israeli population, Mansour said they have "a lot of influence."

Mansour scoffed at the idea that Israel practises apartheid.

"When the Knesset has 14 non-Jewish members, this does not mean there is apartheid. Israel's not perfect, but at least it has the dignity to say that it realizes there are socio-economic gaps between Arab-Israelis and Jewish-Israelis" and that it's working on repairing that, he said.

"It's important for Israel to close the gap between the minority and the majority," Mansour said.

He added that what's good for Israel is good for the Druze – namely, a secure Jewish state that can survive surrounded by its frequently hostile Arab neighbours.

On the topic of Christians in the Middle East, Mansour said he's urging Christians worldwide to move to Israel and cement their hold on their own holy sites.

"Otherwise, they might be overrun by Muslims wishing to wipe out minorities," he said.

This is Mansour's last year in his role with the department of religious affairs. In August, he will once again assume an ambassadorship, this time as Israel's chief envoy to Nigeria.

His parting message to Christian communities in the West is to realize the "new situation" in the Middle East and take appropriate action.

"If you will continue to be silent, it will be too late. There are no second chances in the Middle East," he said.

"If Israel loses one war, it will be the end of the Jewish state and all [non-Muslim] religious holy sites. It will also be the end of minorities… who will be endangered."

Academic doubts Israel will attack Iran

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When it comes to predicting developments in the Middle East, particularly when they relate to Iran's nuclear ambition and Israel's response to it, Mordechai Kedar is something of a contrarian.

Even though prognosticators, analysts and even the U.S. Secretary of Defence believe Israel will attack Iran in the near future, Kedar, a lecturer in Arabic and Islamic studies at Bar-Ilan University, doubts that's about to happen.

Iran, he said, is a problem for the world, not particularly for Israel. Israel won't do the world's dirty work for it by attempting to take out Iran's nuclear facilities.

Mordechai Kedar

It's a message Kedar has been delivering during a speaking tour of North America. In Toronto, he addressed a lunchtime gathering sponsored by the Speakers Action Group, Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University and the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem.

Last week, he was on FoxNews.com, repeating his assertion that Iran's real goal in obtaining nuclear weapons is to first be a regional hegemon and then pursue a much more ambitious goal of world domination. It can do so, he claimed, by controlling the Gulf oil supply, thereby dominating the world economy.

"The Gulf states are shivering from fear from the possibility that Iran will take them. They don't see the world rescuing them from the wrath of the Iranians," he said.

They fear Iran, a Shiite and Persian power, would forcibly convert all of them from their Sunni brand of Islam, he added.

Unlike many Israelis and other observers, Kedar believes Israel's military deterrence protects it – at least for now. Israel and eventually Europe are targets for Iranian domination, he said.

The only way to prevent a relentless march of Iranian hegemony is for world leaders, starting with U.S. President Barack Obama, along with British and French leaders, to deliver a one-week ultimatum demanding that Iran end its nuclear program and load all its materials onto ships leaving the country. Failure to comply should lead to a military campaign that would "flatten" Iran, he said.

Kedar said he is not privy to Israeli military plans, but he doubts the Jewish state is likely to attack Iran.

A colourful and plain-speaking individual, Kedar became a YouTube sensation a few years ago when he went toe to toe with an Al Jazeera host, rejecting Muslim claims to Jerusalem and asserting the Jewish people's right to build apartments in the city. Jerusalem is not mentioned once in the Qur'an, he told the startled interviewer, but it has been the Jews' capital for 3,000 years. Israelis don't need the permission of anyone to build in Jerusalem, he said.

As of last week, the video had received more than 350,000 hits.

Turning to the wider Arab world, Kedar said it is riven by tribal, ethnic and religious differences that make it impossible to create stable nation-states on the western model.

Identity in the region is bound up in one's group, he said. Countries like Libya, Syria, Iraq, Sudan and Yemen are inherently unstable, with factions at each other's throats, with each tribe unwilling to cede power to groups that would dominate them.

All the "isms" that have been tried in the Arab world, including nationalism and socialism, are doomed to failure. They are foreign imports that don't suit Arab societies outside of a small minority of intellectuals, he said.

"Governments of the West don't understand the mentality of the Middle East," he continued. If they did, they'd pursue a policy that would favour the breakup of these states into tribal-based entities.

The only stable Arab countries are in the Gulf, and they're largely one-tribe states. Countries with a multitude of tribes will eventually disintegrate, he predicted.

The same centrifugal forces at work in the wider Arab world are at play among Palestinians. The Palestinians are a tribal society, with various groups dominating West Bank and Gaza cities. Many, with the al-Masri and al-Iraqi names, are originally from Egypt and Iraq, he said.

His solution for the Arab-Israel conflict: eight tribal city-states that Palestinians can call home and that correspond to the fractured nature of the local population.

Coverage of Gaza dug deeper this time

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

From the perspective of the West, the media coverage of last week's flare-up between Israel and Gaza can be broken down into three phases.

In the first phase, wire services (Associated Press, Canadian Press, Reuters) gave a "tit-for tat" account of what transpired following Israel's March 9 targeted killing in Gaza of Popular Resistance Committee (PRC) leader Zuhir al-Qaisi. According to Israeli intelligence, al-Qaisi was planning to launch another terrorist attack on Israelis from the lawless Sinai, where terror groups have been operating freely in the past year.

This "tit-for-tat" reporting is the media's basic approach to covering events. How many mortars and rockets were being fired from Gaza in response? How many were intercepted by Israel's "Iran Dome" missile defence system? How many "militants" in Gaza were killed by IDF strikes? How many civilians were wounded in southern Israel, where one million people live within range of missile fire?

This sort of coverage dominated from March 9 to 11, when Islamic Jihad and the PRC fired missile volleys. AP reported that Hamas itself did not fire rockets, but "allowed other smaller militant groups to unleash salvos," implying that Hamas, the governing authority in Gaza, was ultimately responsible, as Israel has long maintained.

Even Patrick Martin's March 12 Globe and Mail story dealt with the body count – 18 Palestinians dead ("mostly militants") and hundreds of thousands of Israelis taking shelter, and he described what he claimed was a similar civilian reaction on both sides respectively – "cheers" – to the rocket and counter-rocket ("Iron Dome") firings. Still, Martin noted an important disparity, namely that "While tens of thousands of Israeli school children stayed home in shelters… it was school as usual for the Palestinians in Gaza."

In the second phase, March 12 and 13, western journalists began to notice some of the deeper analyses of the situation by Avi Issacharoff (Ha'aretz), Yaakov Katz (Jerusalem Post), and David Horovitz (on his new Times of Israel website).

Issacharoff wrote on March 13: "There's no doubt that one reason Islamic Jihad is continuing its rocket fire on southern Israel is its glaring lack of success. After firing more than 200 rockets at the Negev, they still haven't killed any Israelis." The success of Israel's anti-rocket Iron Dome system – a success that exceeded IDF expectations – was the principal source of frustration for Islamic Jihad and the PRC.

But this wasn't the only factor to frustrate terror groups. Despite Palestinian expectations, Arab leaders across the region largely failed to condemn Israel. Their attention remained focused on the ongoing massacres in Syria. In fact, Gaza ended up down the list of items in major media outlets, including the Arab satellite news station Al Jazeera.

Israel has warned that Iran and Syria have their own interest in distracting attention from both Assad's atrocities and Iran's nuclear program. Shifting the focus to Israel at this time is clearly in their interest, and yet this effort is largely failing due to structural changes in the region. The ongoing power struggle between the Sunni world (led by Saudi Arabia) and the Shiite world (led by Iran) is surfacing in Gaza through various Palestinian proxies.

In the past, Islamic Jihad and Hamas co-ordinated their efforts. Following the "Arab Spring," with the rise of the (Sunni) Muslim Brotherhood, Hamas is drifting from Iran to Egypt – which is hostile to the Shia. But Islamic Jihad is keeping its ties to Iran, and its leadership remains in Syria (from which Hamas has departed). It's no wonder that most Sunni leaders have refused to voice support for Islamic Jihad and the PRC. This sectarian divide will no doubt continue to affect the internal dynamics of Gaza.

In the third phase of coverage, even wire services reflected some of the deeper (and mainly Israeli) analyses, particularly noting Iran's fingerprints on Gaza. Media also considered how the successful Iron Dome system can benefit western countries. As Iran draws closer to a nuclear weapons capability, Israeli defence technologies will surely interest North American and European countries, which rightly recognize the threat Iran poses beyond the Middle East.

Hockey tournament raises funds, awareness

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

More than 240 players participated in a hockey tournament that raised $135,000 for the Joel Schwartz Endowment Fund at the Reena Foundation.

The second annual Joel Schwartz Memorial Hockey Tournament (JSMHT), held on March 11 at Chesswood Arena in Toronto, was created in honour of Schwartz, who died in 2009 at age 25, two weeks after he returned from a Birthright Israel trip.

Diagnosed with Asperger syndrome, Schwartz was a client of the Reena Foundation, an organization that provides services and programs for people with developmental disabilities so they can realize their full potential.

Through the endowment fund, the CIE Birthright-Israel Reena Participant Program gives young people with developmental disabilities the opportunity to experience a Birthright trip to Israel. With the help of a Reena "shadow," who is trained to assist a client with special needs, program participants are fully integrated with non-disabled peers.

The endowment fund ensures that shadows can be sent with Reena clients on Birthright trips. "We know [Joel] would be honoured to have initiated a charity for others like him to grow and develop into mature adults while finding their places in the world," said Jonathan Schwartz, Joel's brother and founder of the tournament with friends Zack Belzberg and Jesse Abrams.

"Joel was a breath of fresh air for many of the people who knew him well, and he leaves behind a legacy bigger than most would after a life of 25 years. He continues to remind family and close friends of the values of respect, family, friendship, and, most importantly, what it takes to become a better person."

In the weeks that followed Schwartz's passing, "the community came together in a way that indicated the impact that both Joel and his family had, and continue to have, on those around them. We knew that we had to find a way to commemorate Joel's valuable legacy and rally the community behind this important cause," said Belzberg.

"Joel loved to watch his brother's hockey games and would be so happy to see his friends and hundreds of others come together in his honour."

The tournament featured games, food, a silent auction, a free skate and a guest appearance by Hockey Hall of Famer and former cabinet minister, Ken Dryden.

"Throughout the evening, I hope people developed a more informed understanding of who Joel was, why it's important to preserve his legacy and how they have contributed to an exciting new initiative created in his honour," said Belzberg.

This year's tournament committee introduced Joel's Ongoing Inclusion Initiative, which will oversee the use of proceeds from the tournament and invest annually in one new program that supports inclusion initiatives at Reena, he said.

"Our committee has dedicated their time, efforts and resources to ensure that those in our community who are living with developmental disabilities are granted the same treatment and life enjoyment that we have been offered," said Jonathan Schwartz. "In doing so, we hope to nurture their mental, emotional and physical growth while empowering them to strengthen their confidence."

Shane Urowitz and Mitch Goldenberg, with Ken Dryden dropping the puck.

Belzberg said the tournament has given him "the ability to witness first-hand the incredible generosity and cohesiveness of our community. Thousands of people have come together as players, volunteers, donors and fans in support of Joel, the Reena Foundation and our committee."

Eric Sherkin, a tournament participant whose brother has autism, said the event surpassed his expectations. "I jumped at the chance to come back for the second year. My brother is a longtime Reena client and still participates in Reena programs all year long. I've seen first-hand how amazing an organization it is, and it truly needs the continued support of the community to be able to provide the kinds of services upon which so many people rely."

Sherkin said that "giving Reena clients the chance to participate in Birthright Israel while still getting the one-on-one support they require is a fantastic initiative, and it seems as though that experience meant a great deal for Joel Schwartz. If we can spread that feeling to more Reena clients, that's a wonderful thing."

Defence chiefs deepen Canada-Israel relationship

IDF's Gantz makes stop on way to Washington

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada and Israel continue to strengthen their defence ties.

Israeli Defence Forces' chief of the general staff, Lieut.-Gen. Benny Gantz made a two-day trip to Ottawa last Thursday and Friday to hold a series of talks with Gen. Walt Natynczyk, Canada's chief of the defence staff, and other high-ranking Canadian military personnel.

It was Gantz's first official trip to Canada and the first stop before leaving for meetings in Washington, D.C., over the weekend.

The two military leaders met to expand upon a memorandum of understanding signed by the two nations in January 2011 that aims "to strengthen existing ties by underlining the practical benefits of our growing defence relationship," according to the Department of National Defence.

That memorandum laid the groundwork for expansion of co-operation between Israel and Canada in the areas of counter-terrorism, training, search and rescue, intelligence, command and control and the sharing of new technologies.

Gen. Walt Natynczyk, left, and Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz attend the Ceremony of Remembrance with the seven Books of Remembrance located in the Memorial Chapel on Parliament Hill on March 15, shortly after the IDF general's arrival in Ottawa. The books are a collective record of the names of more than 118,000 Canadians who died in wars and major conflicts from 1884 to the present day. [IDF photo]

In January, Canada and Israel further cemented their defence relationship when Israel's Ministry of Defence appointed IDF Brig.-Gen. Eden Attias as its first defence attaché to Ottawa.

Natynczyk also hosted Gantz at an official dinner, which included his deputy and other senior officers, and called it an "honour" to meet with his Israeli counterpart.

"Meeting with the chiefs of defence of allied and friendly nations is always time very well spent. This is an important opportunity for us to share perspectives on global security issues," Natynczyk said. "Our relationship with the Israeli Defence Forces is growing. We will continue to build upon our friendship with practical initiatives of mutual benefit."

According to an IDF statement, the two men also met for an extended "one-on-one" meeting on March 16, in which they "exchanged views on current security issues."

Gantz also briefed Natynczyk and his staff about current challenges and trends in the Middle East and "the radical elements which carry negative influence on the area course of the past year," the IDF said.

The CJN will have an interview with Attias in an upcoming issue.

Retired businessman seeks stem cell match

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

David Geneen needs a hero, one who could save his life with hardly more than a cheek swab and ultimately, a blood stem cell donation.

Saving a life doesn't get much easier than that, but finding the right match can be a lot harder.

Geneen, 64, the retired former owner of Grand Touring Automobiles, a car dealership in Toronto, explained that he suffers from myelodysplastic syndrome (MDS), a rare, pre-cancerous blood disease that is chronic and ultimately fatal.

"I was always exhausted and I didn't know why. I thought, it's pressure from work, anxiety, my mother had passed away and it seemed to happen after that, so I thought, maybe I'm just not coping well," said Geneen, who began looking into his symptoms in 2007.

"It turned out there was something wrong."

His doctor discovered that his blood production was abnormal, and after ruling other causes out, he was diagnosed with MDS.

He said his medications had been successful in staving off the disease until recently.

"The drugs have started to wear off, and I'm needing transfusions more often."

A stem cell transplant is the only treatment that can cure MDS.

The good news is that while other blood disorder sufferers can only hope to go into remission after a successful stem cell transplant, MDS patients can be cured completely.

Geneen and his family hope that an upcoming stem cell drive at Holy Blossom Temple on March 25 will result in his match, putting this deadly disease behind him.

But Geneen understands that the odds are against him.

"Because I'm Sephardic, the chances of a match are even lower… Sephardis are harder to match," he said.

Since no one in his family was a match (the odds of a familial match is only 30 per cent), they decided to appeal to the members of the Jewish community – his best chance at finding a donor.

David Geneen, flanked by his sons Julian, left, and Daniel, right, hopes a stem cell drive will result in a match that could save his life.

"I'm not really sure if anything can come out of this for me, but if we can get a couple thousand swabs, that's 2,000 more people who could become donors [for others]," Geneen said.

Lucy Waverman, Geneen's sister, organizer of the stem cell drive, and food columnist for the Globe and Mail, said she's been eagerly spreading the word about the drive through Facebook and by circulating an e-mail containing a plea from Geneen's two sons, Daniel and Julian.

"We love our dad more than you can imagine. He's always been there for us, and now it's our turn to be there for him. We can't imagine life without him," the letter said.

Waverman said she teamed up with OneMatch, the stem cell and marrow network, which will provide enough kits to register 500 people at the drive.

"They'll have more kits available if they see they're running out," she said.

As an incentive to the potential donors, Waverman said she and her "foodie friends" will be providing homemade baked treats.

"We're trying to get people to stay, have a cup of coffee, dessert, talk to David, talk to me," she said.

Truthful Lies, a local band, will also be performing during the event, in hopes of attracting the younger crowd.

"My cousin, who works at Universal Music, will also be hauling in all sorts of CDs to give away," Waverman said.

But more important than enticing crowds with the promise of baked goods and music is dispelling the myths about stem cell donation.

People are often hesitant to register at stem cell and bone marrow drives because of a misconception that donating stem cells and bone marrow is a painful process, Waverman said.

She explained that the process begins with a cheek swab – a cotton swab is rubbed against the inside of your cheek. In the unlikely event that you are a match, if you agree to move forward with the process, you're required to do a physical exam to make sure you're healthy.

According to the OneMatch website, if you pass the physical, you'll register at a hospital as an outpatient and have your blood drawn. The blood passes through a machine that separates the stem cells so they can be transplanted into the patient. The filtered blood is returned to the donor through the other arm.

"You're only in the hospital for a few hours and then you get to go home," Waverman said.

Although Geneen is acutely aware that the odds of finding a match may not be in his favour, he said he's grateful for the new perspective his ordeal has given him.

"When going through something like this, it's easy to become self-centred, but this has helped me get outside myself and think, maybe I can help someone else if not myself."

Waverman is optimistic.

"He's a real fighter and he goes to the gym every day… and he's determined," she said. "I have great admiration for him. He wants this."

The drive is being held at Holy Blossom Temple on March 25 between 12 p.m. and 4 p.m. Alternatively, a cheek-swab kit can be sent to your home by visiting OneMatch.ca.

Jerusalem hostel caters to the non-observant

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A few things set Heritage House – a youth hostel in Jerusalem's Old City – apart from the others.

More than a place to stay, Heritage House, which is divided into two buildings in the Jewish Quarter to separate the men and women, is open to young Jewish travellers who are interested in exploring their Jewish roots.

It's virtually free to stay there – the staff asks for a donation in return for their hospitality – and the hostel is closed during the day to encourage the guests to explore the city and gain experience.

Chaya Weisberg, who directs the women's hostel with her husband, Matan, said a vast majority of their guests are non-observant, disconnected Jews.

"People who want to be at the Kotel, are not for us... The people who don't even know the value of the Kotel, or the value of having a Shabbat in the Old City... those are the people we want to help have that experience," Weisberg said.

Although Weisberg insists that nothing is forced on the guests, the hostel staff is available and eager to offer interested travellers the chance to experience a Shabbat in the Old City, and provide information about travel opportunities, internships and education programs.

"There's no programming. It really is just a hostel, but the live-in staff are there to create the environment, a very Jewish environment, but at the same time, there are no rules," said Weisberg, 29, who lives at the hostel with her husband and three children.

"People can wear what they want, they can use their cellphones and laptops on Shabbat – whatever they're used to, we respect that. They don't have to go to Shabbat meals, they don't have to go to classes, but based on what they want, we give them opportunities and inform them about what is out there."

While the Weisbergs have been working at the Heritage House for nearly eight years, the non-profit organization was founded 26 years ago, by a rabbi who dedicated his life to connecting Jews to their roots.

Rabbi Meir Schuster was "quiet, shy, reserved – not someone who had a gift with words," Weisberg said.

"He would often go to the Kotel to pray, and he saw all these travellers come, take a picture and leave, and it bothered him that that was their whole experience."

Weisberg said Rabbi Schuster became a fixture at the Kotel because he would literally yell at God while he prayed.

No rules at hostel for young people

'They don't have to go to Shabbat meals, they don't have to go to classes'

"People would take pictures of him. He would yell at God because he felt that it was so unfair that there were so many Jewish people who have no opportunity to experience their Judaism... It really hurt him," she said.

"So this shy, quiet, not a socially adept kind of guy went up to them and... he'd tap them on the shoulder and ask, 'Are you Jewish? Do you want to come to a Shabbat meal? Do you want to hear from a Jewish philosopher?'"

She said many of those he approached brushed him off, but over the years tens of thousands accepted his offer and followed him to a class on Jewish thought, or attended their first Shabbat meal with a family who was happy to host a fellow Jew.

He spent 10 years doing this before his efforts were noticed by donors who gave him a generous grant to buy two buildings in the Jewish Quarter.

Over the past 26 years, about 60,000 young Jews from around the world have stayed at the Heritage House.

Sadly, about four years ago at the age of 65, Rabbi Schuster was diagnosed with Lewy body, a disease with debilitating symptoms similar to Alzheimer's and Parkinson's disease. The Weisbergs, who had initially been working at the hostel on a part-time basis while they completed their studies, eventually took over as the directors of the house.

Weisberg said there have been countless examples of guests who arrived at the house with little or no connection to their Judaism, and left having had meaningful Jewish experiences.

Danielle Rose, a 25-year-old Toronto native stayed at Heritage House when she extended her Birthright Israel trip in 2006.

Rose learned about the hostel from her Birthright leader who recommended it as a free place to stay.

Rose, who was then 19 years old, said that beyond celebrating Jewish holidays, she had little connection to her Judaism. Still, she was open to learning more about her heritage.

"I was open to influence and to learning more about Judaism. I had a friend who didn't want to spend Shabbat there, but I actually did want to. I went there to learn about these things," Rose said.

She said her first Shabbat experience was "meaningful, it felt like an authentic experience to be having in Jerusalem."

Rose said her involvement with the Weisbergs and the Heritage House was part of what influenced her to move to Israel for three years and become shomer Shabbat.

Although she has since moved back to Toronto, she said the Heritage House "is good for people who might not otherwise get to experience a Shabbat meal... and want to have a [deeper] experience with observant Jews."

Weisberg said that are countless stories of reluctant, disconnected Jews who have embraced their religious roots following a stay at the hostel.

She remembered one guest who told her she hated Israel, didn't feel a connection to Judaism, and would never return to Israel.

Weisberg said she convinced her that if she were to make an informed decision about whether or not she really hated it, she'd have to learn more.

"She felt comfortable at a liberal place – she went to Pardes [Institute of Jewish Studies] – and she called me a few months later and said she loved the learning so much that she was going to study to become a rabbi," Weisberg said.

"I see that as a tremendous success – to go from not wanting to be affiliated to wanting to make an impact on the Jewish people."

Put your maror where your mouth is

Rabbi Meir Rosenberg

Pesach is the season for asking questions. We all gush with pride when the youngest child stands up to ask the Four Questions of the Haggadah. This is one of the blessings that we enjoy on Pesach. It is indeed a privilege to ask questions. And just as it's important for our children to ask questions, it's even more important that we know how to answer.

Even so, it's impossible for us to know the answers to all of the questions that will be asked at our seder tables this year. Perhaps, then, our secondary emphasis on Pesach should be the technique through which we imbue our available knowledge to our children and families.

Centuries before John Dewey of Columbia University and the inauguration of modern methods in education, our sages insisted that, especially for children, the best way to learn is by doing.

This methodology is evident in the following discussion that we read in the Magid section of the Haggadah during the seder.

At one time, the sages considered the possibility of relating the story of the Exodus long before the seder night. "Yachol me'Rosh Chodesh?" – perhaps the Haggadah should be read on the first day of the month of Nissan?

The answer is no! "Talmud lomar bayom hahu" – because the Torah states: "You shall relate it to your children on that day." This sentence implies that the Haggadah is to be recited on the anniversary of the Exodus.

Rabbinic Reflections

The sages were still in doubt. Could it be that the reading of the Haggadah should take place when it's still daytime, thereby approximating the time when the Korban Pesach was offered in the Temple? Again the answer is no, because inherent in the phrase of the commandment to tell the story of the Exodus is the phrase: "ba'avur zeh" – "because of this." When the word "this," "zeh," is used in the Torah, it must always be referring to something specific. Our sages tell us that the specific something is the time when the Haggadah should be read. That could only be when "the matzah and maror are placed before you."

Talk is not cheap. We value the ability to converse with our children and relate our heritage to them, so much so that the Haggadah recognized that it might take the entire night.

But at the same time, the words of our heritage must not only be heard, but proudly displayed and practised in our homes. We must practise what we know and ask questions about the customs and rituals that we're not familiar with, even beyond Pesach.

A second look at legalized gambling

The Ontario Lottery and Gaming Corporation would like to add a casino in Toronto and make lottery tickets and slot machines more readily available, arguing that this could add up to $2 billion a year to government revenues.

At a time when the Drummond Report has warned that without radical action today, the Ontario deficit could balloon to unmanageable levels, an extra couple of billion dollars could sure help. And since the money would be given voluntarily, it's much less politically or economically painful than tax hikes or spending cuts.

Jewish law lists gamblers among those whose testimony is not accepted in a court of law. According to some, gambling is actually a form of theft, making a gambler a low-level thief. Others note that gamblers "do not engage in the development of the world." One cannot trust the word of non-contributing members of society. The Talmud notes that according to this second accepted opinion, occasional gamblers, who otherwise make positive contributions to society, would have their testimony accepted.

Nonetheless, while the recreational gambler may not be invalidated, gambling – even on an occasional basis – has been frowned upon in our tradition, so much so that Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef, perhaps the pre-eminent authority of Jewish law today, has ruled that Jews may not purchase tickets to Mifal HaPayiss, the Israeli version of Lotto 6/49. And years ago, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein ruled that, ideally, a shul should not raise money through bingo.

Yet the issue is more complex. For many worthy institutions, lotteries serve as an important fundraising mechanism. It's hard to classify people who purchase such lottery tickets as gamblers, although without the (remote) possibility of winning, many would not buy tickets. Government-sanctioned lottery tickets, while offering a greater percentage of revenues in winnings, serve to bring in needed funds.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

One can make a cogent argument that today's casinos are actually very much involved in the "development of the world." They are arguably no different than any other form of entertainment – be they sporting events, movies, theatre–providing gainful employment to many, and much-needed economic benefits. And while one can properly argue that there are better uses for one's time, it's quite clear that entertainment is an important feature of the world we live in.

One may argue that gambling is addictive and has the potential to ruin one's life. However it's no more, and likely much less, ruinous than alcohol, or tobacco for that matter, and no one proposes outlawing those. Societal decisions cannot be driven by worry about how careless individuals may act.

Yet at the same time, we're aware how those who can least afford it are the ones who in reality spend the most on gambling. For the poor, the allure of winning is much more enticing. It's not for nothing that gambling is known as a tax on the poor.

Yet when all is said is done, it appears to me that society has an obligation to act in the best interests of most people. Legalized gambling already exists. Perhaps along with expanding it, some money should be made available to treat those who fall prey to its addictive nature.

Kosher Jesus is rather treif

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

One of the most controversial areas for ancient historians is determining the true character, worldview and biography of the historical Jesus. While fundamentalist Christians believe that the depiction of Jesus in the New Testament is, so to speak, gospel truth, judicious New Testament scholars generally admit that they have little certain knowledge about the historical Jesus. They contend that the four gospels were written many years after Jesus died by authors who had vested interests and who actually never knew Jesus. Furthermore, there are serious discrepancies between the four gospels.

A new book on this subject is causing a stir: Kosher Jesus, by Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, known to some as "America's rabbi," author of the controversial best-seller Kosher Sex, and rumoured candidate both for chief rabbi of England and the Republican nomination for a U.S. Congress seat in New Jersey. Were it not for the fame of the author, there is little reason to think that the book would be drawing attention. It contributes nothing new to the historical Jesus debate. Rabbi Boteach is not a New Testament scholar, yet he paints a non-standard picture of Jesus about which he expresses no doubts. It is based almost entirely on the scholarship of the late Prof. Hyam Maccoby, an academic whose views do not reflect the scholarly consensus.

Rabbi Boteach is certain that Jesus observed all the mitzvot of the Torah like any pious first-century Jew; that Jesus was never opposed by the contemporary rabbinic leadership, since he was one of them; that Jesus was a proud Jew who got into trouble with and was crucified by the Romans because he encouraged Jews to reject Roman culture and oppose the Roman occupation; that the New Testament "slanders a good man" when it claims that Jesus said, "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's"; that the New Testament character Judas never existed; that Pontius Pilate was a ruthless tyrant, not the sensitive man of the gospels; that Jesus would never have allowed himself to be called the son of God and would never have claimed to have been born of a virgin; that Matthew's interpretation of Isaiah 7:14 is "ridiculous"; that Jesus wanted to deliver the Jews from Rome, but Paul wanted to deliver them from Judaism, and that "the editors of the New Testament took a Jewish sage and lover of his people and put a white hood on his head and a swastika on his arm, and sent him out spewing vitriol against his people."

The book is, to be blunt, sloppy. To cite just two trivial examples, Rabbi Boteach writes that the Second Temple was destroyed in 70 BCE (p. 169) – it was 70 CE. At another point, he writes that in the gospel of John, the trial of Jesus took place on the second night of Passover (p. 91). Actually in that gospel, Jesus was, significantly, killed on the eve of Passover (see John 19:31), and his trial took place before his execution.

As a student of Jewish history, I consider Rabbi Boteach's speculative reconstruction of the historical Jesus possible. But it is hardly provable, and it fails the test of a good scientific hypothesis, as it is not falsifiable: Rabbi Boteach dismisses any evidence that might be cited against his theory as the opinions of New Testament editors who were allegedly embarrassed by the true story of pious Rabbi Jesus.

Another problem I have with the book is that I have always felt that it is impolite and possibly imprudent for Jews, and perhaps particularly for rabbis, to turn to practitioners of another religion and tell them they don't really understand their own religion correctly, and if they just listened to us Jews, they would understand it better.

The reaction to this book has been telling. Many fundamentalist Christians seem delighted by it, even though it rejects and sometimes scorns standard Christian beliefs about Jesus and about important theological issues, such as how people improve or "save" themselves. And many Jews are upset by it, even though it portrays Jesus essentially as a proud Orthodox rabbi. One Toronto Orthodox rabbi, Rabbi J. Immanuel Shochet, has suggested that it should be banned as heretical.

Perhaps the same principle explains both the positive evangelical and the negative Jewish reactions. Rabbi Boteach makes it perfectly clear that he hopes that this book will bring Jews and Christians together as they all agree to esteem pious Rabbi Jesus. Those Christians who would like to see Jews accept the "true messiah" can't help smile when they see an Orthodox rabbi admiring Jesus. They presumably realize that Rabbi Boteach is not advocating Christianity, but they feel that he has taken a bold step closer. As Dr. Kenneth Beshore, founder and president of the World Bible Society (and one of many evangelicals who is on a first-name basis with Rabbi Boteach) writes on the book's dust-jacket, "Few evangelical Christians can really understand how difficult it is to do what Rabbi Shmuley has done. I pray his journey continues."

Prudent religious Jews who realize that we are a tiny minority in North America in a predominantly Christian society can't help wonder what is accomplished by trying to bring Jews and Christians even closer together around a supposedly shared theological truth. I squirmed as I read Rabbi Boteach referring to the American Dr. Michael Brown (no connection to any Torontonian of that name), as my "dear friend… I love Mike." Brown, an apostate Jew, dedicates his life to converting more Jews to Christianity, not an undertaking that generally wins rabbis' love.

Even if we grant that there is little fear that a new conception of Jesus will lead American Jews to Christianity, the idea that Jews and Christians might come together around Rabbi Boteach's postulated historical Jesus is absurd. At one point in the book (p. 136), Rabbi Boteach admits, "The two Jesuses [his and the New Testament's] are irreconcilable." On the very next page he writes, "The images may seem inherently contradictory. But then again, it's not so strange to hold two simultaneous and seemingly contradictory views of Jesus."

Sorry, Rabbi Boteach, but it is.

Embattled seniors home seeks new CEO

Former chief official 'lightning rod' for perceived faults

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Simkin Centre, Winnipeg's embattled Jewish seniors home, is officially in the market for a new chief executive in the wake of the not-unanticipated resignation of longtime CEO Sandra Delorme.

Delorme, who had been a lightning rod for criticism for the perceived faults of the seniors home over the past couple of years, had been on sick leave since last October. Her resignation was announced March 13.

"Sandra did a wonderful job for us," said Bill Brownstone, spokesperson for the Simkin Centre board. "She was with us for nine years and was intimately involved in the construction of our new building," which opened in south Winnipeg in 2001.

The institution, which was long known as the Sharon Home, is almost 100 years old. Formerly situated on two sites, its north Winnipeg location closed in fall 2008 following the completion of phase II of the south Winnipeg building.

Brownstone praised Delorme for "co-ordinating the relocation of all our residents from our former north Winnipeg location, [which] was a huge job. She did a great job. It is unfortunate that she recently developed health problems."

While Delorme may have been a good administrator, her people skills have been questioned by a group of individuals who are very unhappy with the care their parents received there as residents.

Sandra Delorme

Delorme was caught in the eye of a storm that began about 18 months ago with the death of Lilyan Peck, a 93-year-old resident of the home, shortly after she was transferred to a hospital, where it was found she was suffering from a severe, untreated infection.

As a result of Peck's death and lobbying efforts by her daughter, Marsha Palansky, as well as Harriet Berkal Sarbit and Harvey Berkal – whose father, Rabbi Louis Berkal, was a resident of the home for the last few months of his life – and others, a number of investigations into the Simkin Centre's operations were conducted last year.

One of them was done by Peter Kafka, CEO of the Louis Brier Home, Vancouver's main Jewish seniors residence.

Kafka painted a picture of a staff suffering from low morale due to a combination of factors including ongoing negative publicity over the past year, unrealistic expectations from some of the families, "a lack of perceived leadership" and a "lack of trust" among some staff members.

He recommended that regular staff meetings be held and that annual staff satisfaction surveys be conducted. He also urged management to circulate in the building to improve communication with staff, patients and families.

"While most families are satisfied with the care and support their family members receive, lack of access to and lack of visibility of senior staff was a common theme," Kafka wrote. "Many families did not feel welcomed by the staff and felt the staff resented their involvement."

A statement from a group calling itself "Delegation of Concerned Families," which is led by Palansky and the Berkal siblings, wished Delorme "all the best with her health" in the future.

"At the same time however," the statement added, "we are optimistic that a change in administration will only have a positive impact on the health and welfare of the residents and the Home at large. This resignation is in keeping with the recommendations of Peter Kafka, who recognized the need for a reorganization of the institution to bring it to its optimal functioning base."

They said they hoped Delorme's departure "marks the start of a bright future for Simkin, incorporating a more transparent and community-based approach to its governance – an approach that must focus first and foremost on improving medical and nursing care in the facility."

They urged that as the board searches for new CEO, a "wide source of candidates should be canvassed through widespread advertising. And the person they select should possess the necessary qualifications to instill confidence in the entire community."

Brownstone said the board is looking for a new CEO with strong health-care experience and managerial skills who "can relate to our culture."

In a related development, the Berkals and Palansky are continuing to pursue legal action against the Simkin Centre in connection with Peck's death.

Palansky and the Berkals had tried to launch a private prosecution against the home. After considering the request and the evidence the complainants presented, the Crown declined to prosecute, but it did refer the evidential material to the Winnipeg Police Service to investigate further.

In reponse to a query on the progress of the investigation, the police would only say that "this is an ongoing investigation and there is no further information to provide."

Former spymaster sees long war ahead against Islam

Halevy to share his views at Winnipeg lecture

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As a former director of Israel's Mossad, Efraim Halevy knows how to keep secrets. But, on the other hand, he is not shy about sharing his many opinions about the Mideast conflict and about Israel.

Halevy is known for sometimes making controversial comments. He has said that Israel should take up Hamas' offer of a long-term truce and negotiate with the group because the Islamic movement is respected by Palestinians and generally keeps its word. He also said the growing haredi radicalization within Israel poses a bigger risk to Israel than Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. And he believes that it will take at least 25 years for the West to win its war against radical Islam.

Halevy will be sharing these and other opinions with members of Winnipeg's Jewish community when he takes the podium on May 3, as the guest speaker at the seventh annual Sol and Florence Kanee Distinguished Lecture Series, the Jewish Heritage Centre's major yearly fundraiser.

Halevy's predecessors on the podium have included historians Sir Martin Gilbert and Deborah Lipstadt, Rabbi Chaim Rozwaski, political commentator David Frum and Halevy's fellow Israeli machers, Shlomo Avineri, director general of Israel's Foreign Ministry in prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's first cabinet, and Dore Gold, former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations.

"I think Efraim Halevy is going to be the most fascinating speaker who we have heard to date," says Belle Millo, chair of the Freeman Family Foundation Holocaust Education Centre, who suggested the former Mossad director and author of Man in the Shadows (2006) as this year's Kanee lecture series speaker. "I had spoken to a number of people who had heard him speak and were greatly impressed," she says.

Efraim Halevy

"He has been the confidant of five prime ministers and served as Israel's ambassador to the European Union in addition to his career in the Mossad. I think his role in helping to forge the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan was an incredible accomplishment."

Millo adds that Halevy has been known to speak his mind on numerous issues. "He can't be pigeon-holed as left wing or right wing," she says. "That makes him unique."

The British-born Halevy, 63, began working for the Mossad in 1961. His Mossad career spanned 28 years, during which he headed three different branches. He became deputy director in 1990. He was appointed Israeli ambassador to the EU in Brussels in 1996. In 1988, following the resignation of Mossad director Danny Yalom, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Halevy back from Brussels to head the agency.

After leaving government service in 2003, Halevy took up a post as head of the Center for Strategic and Policy Studies at Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Quebec opposition condemns ritual slaughter

Two parties demand investigation into kosher, halal practices

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The opposition Parti Québécois and the new party Coalition Avenir Québec last week demanded that Quebec's Charest government investigate the distribution of ritually slaughtered meat in the province.

Describing the practice as contrary to "Quebec values," PQ agriculture critic André Simard, a veterinarian, on March 14 called on Agriculture Minister Pierre Corbeil to provide a full public accounting of Muslim halal and kosher slaughter by March 23.

On March 15, Premier Jean Charest underlined the need for strict assurances that any ritually slaughtered meat is labelled as such, but the government did not respond directly to the PQ's demand.

Agriculture Minister Pierre Corbeil decried the PQ's tone as "alarmist" and rejected claims of cruelty or lack of safety with regard to ritual slaughter. Mount Royal Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman denounced the PQ for "odious ethnic bashing, between the lines."

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) deplored the PQ's raising of a "false problem".

What triggered the issue were media reports that poultry slaughtered according to halal ritual at at least one meat processor was being sold to the public without being identified as such.

Simard said that the law permitting ritual slaughter is a federal one that "crashes headlong into Quebec values," a claim that "outraged" CIJA.

"In Quebec, we have made the choice long ago to slaughter our animals for consumption by taking measures to anesthetize animals and to slaughter them by minimizing their suffering," Simard said in a statement.

"In their great openness, Quebecers accept, as an exception, that religious communities can go ahead with slaughter according to their rituals. But, when the exception becomes the rule, there is a problem." According to information he said he has, such practices are becoming more and more widespread.

Simard told the media elsewhere that halal or kosher slaughter may raise the risk of human disease, including the spread of E. coli bacteria.

CAQ leader François Legault said: "We are in Quebec and that [ritual slaughter] must be the exception." CAQ shares the PQ's concern to the extent that consumers have the right to know what they're buying, he said.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko slammed the PQ for "trying to score cheap political points by exploiting the worst tendencies of Quebecers" when they fear their identity is threatened. The spiritual leader of Montreal's Congregation Beth Israel-Beth Aaron also called it an "ignorant attack" and challenged shchitah's critics to come to an abbatoir and witness what's done there.

"It has been confirmed numerous times and in a variety of countries that kosher slaughter is beyond reproach. It is unfair to characterize shchitah as anything but the most humane method possible. It's the quickest and most painless.

"In fact, western civilization owes a debt of gratitude to the tradition Jews bequeathed to the world of limiting cruelty to animals."

The PQ is raising a baseless issue, at least with regard to Jewish slaughter, because kosher meat has been clearly identified and marketed as such for nearly a century in Quebec, said CIJA Quebec vice-president Luciano Del Negro in a March 16 statement. "To claim that it threatens to become the norm is strictly unfounded."

He also said it is unacceptable to suggest kosher meat could be a health risk, because kosher slaughter conforms to the same governmental standards as any other method of slaughter.

In a letter to CIJA, CAQ immigration critic Benoît Charette acknowledged these points. "To claim that these practices lack transparency is, consequently, false," he wrote.

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, the executive director of the Vaad Ha'ir, the main kashrut supervisory body in Quebec, which oversees the MK hechsher, thinks it's impossible for meat or poultry slaughtered according to kashrut to make its way into the general market.

Meat or poultry destined for the kosher consumer is supervised constantly from the time of slaughter through the butchering and processing, he said.

Rabbi Schachar Orenstein of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue spoke at the annual convention of Quebec veterinarians last November about kosher slaughter. The professional order devoted a half-day session to ritual slaughter and also heard from one of its prominent opponents.

Rabbi Orenstein said he hopes Quebec won't embark on a debate on banning such slaughter, as has taken place in some European countries, most recently France, and notably New Zealand.

Rabbi Orenstein, who is a vegetarian and an animal lover, said if Quebecers are opposed to ritual slaughter because they are concerned about animal welfare, he believes, a respectful dialogue is in order.

"However, I wonder if there is something else behind this initiative. My question is: what is the motivation for bringing this up now? I think that there are a lot of other more pressing issues, such as how livestock is raised and transported."

The Muslim Council of Montreal, which represents 275,000 Muslims, condemned the "inflammatory culture war being instigated by" the PQ and certain Quebec media.

Spokesperson Salam Elmenyawi said that they are "seeking to create a mass hysteria and frenzy by deliberately twisting and misrepresenting the facts in this issue," noting that halal slaughter is subject to the same safety controls as any other.

One Quebec politician who has spoken out against the attempt to make ritual slaughter a political football is Amir Khadir, the sole MNA for the sovereignist Québec solidaire, who is known for his anti-Israel statements and politics.

"I find it deplorable that the PQ is importing this debate launched in France by the Front National and is playing on the fears of the population. As a doctor, I have never seen a health problem linked to halal or kosher meat."

Student population has grown to 57 since '09

Rabbi Miller said that since he moved to Calgary in 2009, the school's student population jumped from 34 students to 57.

"We'd like to grow even more... and show them what we have to offer," said Rabbi Miller, a father of 11 children and grandfather of 25 (and counting).

Rabbi Miller said that in the short time he's been living in Calgary, his congregation has grown significantly.

"Like every synagogue, you have people who come three times a year, and then you have your regulars. When we came 2-1/2 years ago, we had one young family – not counting teachers and rabbis – that came to shul every week. Now we have seven," he said, adding that his congregation has roughly 140 families.

Rabbi Miller boasted that his community is a welcoming one.

"Here, people don't necessarily fit into one box. In larger cities, you can find a synagogue where everyone is just like you. We have people who are not as observant by conventional standards, we have people who are on their way, people who are modern Orthodox, people who are ultra-Orthodox, and it's a family," he said.

"We feel we have something really important here and we want other people to know about it."

The Rabbi said he has ambitions to build an eruv, an enclosure that allows shomer Shabbat Jews to transfer objects from one place to another on Shabbat, which would otherwise be prohibited.

"We're trying to build something here."

The campaign to lure Jewish families to Calgary with the promise of free tuition has already resulted in one family from Montreal moving to Calgary, he said.

A few more families have also inquired about the offer.

"If someone moves here, they won't have to worry about making a Shabbat meal for the first six months. We set them up with families," Rabbi Miller said.

"We provide a sense of being a part of a spiritual community. It's not just a shul – you belong here. My ideal is that everybody should visit Calgary, fall in love with the place, and if they can move here, great. If not, they can love us from afar."

Egyptian, Israeli diplomats meet with students

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The consuls general of both Israel and Egypt were confronted with heated questions at a Concordia University event organized by a pro-Israel student club.

The Egyptian envoy, Amin Meleika, was disparaged by some students for sitting at the same table as an Israeli diplomat, for his defence of Egypt's ruling military council and his Mubarak-era connections, while the Israeli Joel Lion faced accusations about his country's alleged aggression against civilians in Gaza and doubts about Jewish national rights.

The situation, however, never got out of hand, thanks to polite but firm chairing by Dana Remer and Ehle Shachter, co-presidents of Concordia Students for Israel (CSI). The group was formed last semester by students of varying political leanings as an "educational initiative" and to encourage dialogue.

The March 14 event, which was open to anybody, was held in the seventh-floor Concordia Student Union lounge, with visible security. About 100 students attended, exceeding the number of chairs set up.

It was publicized as being co-sponsored with the Concordia Egyptian Students Association, but Remer said the group pulled out the morning of the event.

Remer said she respected that decision and credited the 15 or so members who did attend with helping to calm things down when questioning was becoming hostile.

The scheduled discussion on the importance of peace between Israel and Egypt was overshadowed by the Islamist-led Egyptian parliament's anti-Israel resolution earlier in the week and renewed fighting between Israel and Gaza terrorists.

It was also taking place while Israeli Apartheid Week continued at Concordia with an exhibition at the McConnell building.

Meleika, who has been in Montreal since December 2010, described the 1979 Egypt-Israel peace treaty, although limited, as still being in the interest of both countries.

Israeli Consul General Joel Lion talks with students after the Concordia University event.

Egyptian Consul General Amin Meleika talks with students after the Concordia University event.

However, whatever regime comes to power in his country will be "taking into account the opinions of the man on the street" and that is turning against Israel, he said, because they see Gaza Palestinians as being "punished for matters that are out of their hands..."

"Egyptians always thought that the treaty would lead to a broader regional settlement, particularly of the Palestinian question," he said, adding that "disunity and mistakes" among Palestinians is also to blame.

Meleika said Egyptians today are about equally divided among those who want to keep the treaty, those who want it repealed, and those who don't know. If Israel and the Palestinians achieved a lasting peace, polls indicate that roughly 40 per cent of Egyptians would support maintaining their treaty with Israel.

Lion said that sitting together with his Egyptian counterpart shows that, at the official level, the two states can disagree without resorting to violence.

However, the ties between Hamas and the Muslim Brotherhood, which is gaining support in Egypt, have Israel wondering how much longer it can trust that country, he said.

The first to ask questions were two women wearing the hijab. One, incensed by the Egyptian and Israeli flags side by side, started yelling at Meleika in Arabic.

"I did not organize this event, I was invited to participate," he replied. "It is my job to talk about the situation in Egypt and to present the government's policies in all its aspects, including the treaty. I did not force you, I did not ask you, to come here."

Lion, not quite as coolly as Meleika, responded to comments about Israeli armed forces allegedly killing civilians: "As I always tell my own people: Don't believe your own propaganda."

He contended Palestinian terrorists use civilians as "human shields," hiding munitions in residential neighbourhoods, even schools. Israel has no choice to strike there if it is to defend itself, he said.

On the other hand, Gazans are targeting missiles at Israeli citizens, he said.

"We are family. We have to find a way. I respect the Palestinian people and their right to an independent state. They must accept Israel as the state of the Jewish nation... There is no other solution but one state for each people... A bi-national state is not viable," Lion said.

Many students stayed behind after the formal session gathering around each of the diplomats to continue the discussion in a less heated manner.

Concordia fine arts professor David Pariser, active with the pro-Israel Canadian Institute for Jewish Research, called the event "a red-letter day for Concordia."

"There was arguing and shouting, but overall it was a civil discourse," he said in an interview. "There could have been a disaster here, things could have gotten out of control, but the students agreed to disagree. You can't expect better than that."

Remer was also pleased at the conclusion.

Asked if she thought unnecessary risk had been taken in staging such an open event, Remer said, "One of the problems on this campus and in the city is that people are afraid of yelling or repercussions or of a repeat of 2002 [a reference to the violent protest against Benjamin Netanyahu]. We want people to not be fearful. We knew that the second Israel comes up there will be emotion, but this was in a civilized, academic manner.

"We also had confidence that when we asked people to step down, they would, even if it was not right away."

Haifa U course teaches web hasbarah strategies

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A new course at the University of Haifa will teach students how to use new media to reclaim Israel's narrative from its detractors.

Eli Avraham, a senior lecturer at Haifa U's communications department who leads the program, said when false claims are made about Israel, such as labelling it an apartheid state, people need to be equipped with knowledge and tools to speak out against those claims.

"The main idea is that this is about how to use the new media to reclaim Israel's narrative and promote Israel's point of view," Avraham said.

"I'm an expert in public diplomacy during crises – what kinds of strategies countries can use to restore their image after a crisis... With the knowledge that I've accumulated over the years in public diplomacy, I can help somebody."

The course, titled "Ambassadors Online," is free and not accredited. It was designed for students, whether they're acquiring a PhD or an undergraduate degree, who want to learn how to combat anti-Israel bias in the media.

Avraham explained that the four-hour-a-week program was initiated and co-ordinated by students who were eager to learn about hasbarah.

"I'm from the communications department, and my students told me that it's not fair that the only students that can study a course about Israeli hasbarah belong to the communications department," he said.

One of his doctoral students, David Gurevitz, took the lead in approaching the dean of students, the student union, and the university's Comper Center for the Study of Anti-Semitism and Racism, all of whom agreed to support it.

"A ministry spokesman can issue an official statement. But we, as students, can make personal connections and speak as a primary source. As young people living the Israeli reality, we have a real chance to influence people," Gurevitz said in a statement.

About 50 students applied to take the course, but only 30 were selected, Avraham said, adding that he was thrilled with the level of interest and never anticipated turning students away.

Eli Avraham

The course, which teaches students how to write and edit Wikipedia entries, maintain a pro-Israel Facebook page, write balanced, factual blog entries, and challenge anti-Israel views in chat rooms and forums, requires that students speak and write in English well.

"The interview was in English, because they need to be able to write their Facebook and Twitter messages in English. We hope they're going to be in touch with people all over the world, so English is needed," Avraham explained.

The students will also hear from expert guest lecturers, including Reda Mansour, the former Israeli consul general in Atlanta, as well as Miri Eisen, the former foreign press adviser to the prime minister, and Neil Lazarus, a Ministry of Foreign Affairs external adviser.

"We teach them about history, about what really happened, about public diplomacy... and how to understand your audience," Avraham said.

He added that during the first class, held last week, he gave a lecture on how American and European media cover the Middle East conflict.

Not surprisingly, when students heard about the course, some expressed concern that it might be sponsored by the Israeli foreign ministry, or that it would push a right-wing agenda.

"I don't have an agenda. I'm not supporting the right. I'm not supporting the left. What I'm saying is that there is a lot of knowledge out there, and we can do better," Avraham said.

Next year he hopes to present the course entirely in English in order to accommodate international students who might be interested in it. He also has ambitions to develop a program that can be taught through centres for Jewish studies at universities around the world.

YU panel explores Jewish education

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Society turns towards secularism at certain times in history, Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Rabbi Daniel Korobkin told an audience of about 200 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation earlier this month.

"It's not because world events have shaken people's faith, but because of new media and technology, which have caused people to be less pensive and thoughtful about religious issues."

Rabbi Korobkin was speaking at a Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University's event on "Igniting Spiritual Passion in a World of Religious Routine," which was part of a weekend-long Yeshiva University Shabbaton, held March 9 to 12.

The event brought together five panellists from Yeshiva University to discuss how to spark spirituality in Jewish education: Rabbi Hershel Schachter, Rabbi Isaac Elchanan, Rabbi Kenneth Brander, Dr. Rona Novick, Yeshiva University president Richard Joel and Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner, who served as the founding rosh kollel of Toronto's Yeshiva University Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash.

The panellists emphasized that encouraging Jewish children to be inspired about religion should be a priority of Jewish educators.

"We are the first and foremost teachers of our children and grandchildren," Rabbi Brander said. "Sometimes there is a spiritual void in our classrooms."

While some of the panel members raised concerns that students are not encouraged to ask questions or delve deeply into Jewish texts in the classroom, others shifted the responsibility onto parents.

"They spend the first 18 years with you, so what I want to ask is, 'What happens at your Shabbat table?'" Novick said.

The panel agreed that children need good spiritual role models if they are to pass on the passion for Judaism to their children.

"Children can sniff hypocrisy from a mile away so if you teach spirituality but don't practise it, what message are we sending?" Novick asked.

"The best way to ignite spirituality in children is for them to see people living real and spiritual lives."

Children should be encouraged to ask questions about religion, even if teachers do not have the answer, Novick said, but many teachers are reluctant to admit to a student that they can't answer their question. So they just move on to the next subject.

"The problem is that we're actually very good in nursery school, when kids have questions about God, but then it gets us nervous. We forget to allow ourselves to be uncomfortable and not know... We have to make time in our educational curriculums to perhaps memorize less, fill the vessel with less knowledge, but make sure the connections we build are real and valuable."

In a world of rapid technological changes, which seem to foster a narcissistic culture, Rabbi Brander noted, it is important to remember that students are still looking for meaning.

"In this world there may be a big focus on one's self, but I still see young people really focused on ensuring that they live lives of meaning. Our job is to find ways to show them how they can," he said.

Tackling gender segregation in Israel

Retired general set to speak in Toronto

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

With security issues still taking centre stage in news headlines in Israel, the country's long-ignored gender-segregation crisis continues to fester.

That's why retired brigadier-general Israela Oron, an analyst and commentator on Israeli security and strategic affairs with a background in gender issues, says that now is the time to put Israeli women's plight on the table.

Oron, who was the first woman to command an all-male officer-training course in the Israeli Air Force and the first woman to serve on the faculty of the National Defense College, will be speaking on "Gender, Security and Religion in Israel" on March 25 at Temple Sinai in Toronto. The event is free and is being sponsored by the New Israel Fund of Canada, Temple Sinai and ARZA – Canadian Association of Reform Zionists.

In the last few months, gender problems hit the front pages in Israel. Women were instructed to sit at the back of buses, and female performers in the Israel Defence Forces entertainment corps were told not to sing, because it was "too sexual." Then billboards in Jerusalem and other cities deemed "more religious" than elsewhere in Israel, blurred or cropped women's faces in advertisements, and an eight-year-old Orthodox schoolgirl was called a prostitute by a group of men who deemed her attire too liberal.

Israela Oron

"We are facing a problem in equality in certain cities and towns in Israel where the majority of the population are ultra-orthodox and this has an impact on all of Israeli society," Oron told The CJN.

The haredi may be a minority in the overall population, but Oron warns that politicians who say they'd rather maintain the status quo than deal with the issues at hand are actually leading Israeli society astray.

"There's an attitude… let us leave them alone and allow them to deal with those issues in the places they live," says Oron. "Not only do I not agree with that but I object to it. If we describe Israel as a democracy, I cannot accept the fact that women are treated differently because of gender. It's not about, 'Let them do what they want because they don't live in our neighbourhood.' It's not OK. We cannot have two kinds of rules. This is my business, even if I'm not religious."

Oron knows what she's talking about. She broke through the gender barrier during her distinguished military career. Oron's last military posting was as the commander of the IDF's Women's Corp, for which she initiated significant reforms.

The original Declaration of Independence in 1948 promised "complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex," she says.

And while women have held top positions in Israel, Oron says that in politics, in the military or in day-to-day life, sexist remarks and practices are prevalent.

But she's optimistic that activist groups will help Israeli society get back on track.

Oron serves on the boards of leading peace and social justice organizations, including the Geneva Accord, the Acharai Movement, and the New Israel Fund international council.

"Israel cannot separate itself from western society and excluding women is a no go," she says. "The New Israel Fund is the kind of organization that is in the frontline of fighting segregation of women and minorities and fighting for Israel to be a democracy. If the NIF plans will be successful, I think that we have a good chance to stop this trend."

Workshop helps survivors of gender-based violence

The workshop, which took place earlier this month, focused on practical skills necessary to support survivors of gender-based violence.

The local social workers were taught to hone their interviewing skills, and practise active listening and supportive engagement, self-regulation and stress-management techniques.

Zahavi said the ultimate goal is to educate the local community about the value of women in society.

"When the government heard what we're doing, they asked us to provide a wider national training program on gender-based violence. They approached us," Zahavi said.

"Our main idea now is to help the South Sudanese government… currently in gender-based violence, and later on with health issues and then agriculture production. We're gradually trying to figure out their needs and we're basing it upon their request."

Zahavi credited UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which partly funds the organization, for its support.

"UJA has, from the beginning, been supporting this. They supported us in the initial phase of the relief distribution when South Sudan first received their independence," Zahavi said.

"They provided us with funding to distribute relief items in the camps in surrounding Juba. They've continued to support our efforts on a long-term basis."

Zahavi said he hopes, with continued support, the initiative will foster lasting changes in the region.

"Hopefully over the next year, we'll provide them with as much training as we can and eventually these groups will spread out throughout South Sudan in the smaller towns and build a system where they're better able to deal with the whole gender issue."

Dr. Gideon Koren, founder of Motherisk, a program for pregnant women run out of the Hospital for Sick Children, has been awarded a top achievement award in health research.

The award is sponsored by the Canadian Institutes of Health Research and the Canadian Medical Association Journal.

Koren, 65, a native of Israel and a graduate of Tel Aviv University's Sackler Faculty of Medicine, established Motherisk in 1985, three years after he arrived at the hospital to study the effects of medicines of unborn children.

Dr. Gideon Koren

He is a pediatrician, pharmacologist and toxicologist at the University of Toronto and the University of Western Ontario, as well as a professor of medicine at both U of T and Western.

In accepting the award, Koren said that every year, scores of new medications enter the market, but few of them have safety data concerning fetal exposure during pregnancy.

"With half of all pregnancies unplanned, and with large numbers of women who have conditions requiring treatment during pregnancy, there is a serious knowledge gap as to which medications are safe for the baby and which should be avoided."

Motherisk was established, he said, to acknowledge this gap.

Its mandate is to counsel women and health professionals, conduct large-scale laboratory and clinical research, and translate this knowledge into counselling, Koren said.

"Motherisk is at the forefront of knowledge translation, empowering the continuity between the laboratory, the patient and the population," he said.

"By telephone, fax, e-mail or in person, the team – currently 75 members – counsels over 200 women and health professionals daily, directly affecting the care of thousands of Canadian women and their infants each year, in addition to numerous international cases."

It is the only line in the world, he said, for women who want to know how to deal with morning sickness safely.

He said that the Brewers Association of Canada supports a Motherisk hotline for women who abuse drugs and alcohol, "because they want to help women avoid drinking or taking drugs while pregnant.

"A big step came when Shoppers Drug Mart sponsored a 1-800 number, so calls can come from across the country and internationally."

Many women are afraid to take necessary medication during pregnancy, he said, "but not taking it can be more dangerous. Every week, we see women who are empowered to take their medication safely.

"They are [often given bad advice] about their medications. It is a national sport to frighten pregnant women. We let them know the risks of untreated conditions on both them and their baby," he said.

If Motherisk staff determine that a woman is addicted to drugs or alcohol, he said, they refer her to therapy. "There is a lot we can do for them. We can put their mind at ease, or we can warn them that they may need help."

Koren said he is gratified to be doing this work. "I get a lot of letters from women whose pregnancies went well because of our help. Their physicians are also grateful. It is a very good feeling to know that we can change the way women and babies are treated."

Sports journalist Michael Landsberg recently spoke about his battle with depression. Beauty from the inside out

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

Years ago, when I worked for a national television talk show, we did a program on the "beauty myth." I'll never forget the guest who had taught the first-ever women's studies class.

She asked her students to bring in a picture of someone they deemed to be the most beautiful. At the time, Farrah Fawcett was a beauty icon and so every girl in the class brought in a picture of the actor.

The professor brought in a picture of an 80-year-old woman diving into a pool of water. She was wearing a bathing cap, and her makeup-free face was healthy and fresh. That woman's health, vitality and well-being was shining through, and the professor wanted to make the point that this picture of health was truly beautiful.

We are so hard on ourselves, always worrying about that extra weight, the physical imperfections that come with aging and fading beauty. Bliss and well-being are much more important than outer beauty or a youthful appearance, and I am concerned when I see teens to 80-somethings obsessing about how they look on the outside, and putting their energy into salvaging their youth instead of embracing and loving the way they are inside with all of their "Shirley Valentine" imperfections.

Now I'm not saying that each new birthday doesn't bring that (gulp!), "I'm still 21 years old. Why are there so many extra candles on my birthday cake?" phenomenon. But as one of my best friends, Sari, always says, "It's a happy problem."

And as a coach who specializes in helping people find inner bliss, it is worrying to see the focus on an area that really doesn't bring any inner peace or happiness.

So I was very excited when I was combing through my favourite new website, Pinterest, to find a book called Beautiful You by Rosie Molinary, which deals with exactly this notion of truly being happy with the way we are.

Every day we are bombarded with images of beauty in magazines, newspapers and movies and on the Internet and TV. This book helps women and girls to develop a healthier self-image and learn how to love themselves from within and not just the way they look on the outside. Instead of typical affirmations and meditations, Molinary has a 365-day action plan that gives the reader daily actions and exercises that they can to do to retrain their minds to love their bodies and themselves from the inside out

A guest on another show, which I produced, had 18 plastic surgeries to turn herself into a living, breathing Barbie doll. And I distinctly remember her showing up at our studio with three outfits, including one that resembled the pink-and-white polka-dot dress my first Barbie had sported many years ago. The psychotherapist on the panel said that it didn't matter how beautiful or great this Barbie lookalike appeared; there was something wrong with the overemphasis on her looks and her desire to turn herself into an inanimate object. It didn't matter how many surgeries she had; none of them were able to repair her damaged self-esteem.

So how can young girls, teens and even older women and men boost their confidence and learn how to love themselves? Well, a great way to start is to check out The Everything Self-Esteem Book by Robert M. Sherfield. Some of his tips on how to create more healthy self-esteem are: to practise optimism, learn to live on the light side, strive for some joy every day and let go of perfection.

So whether you're craving potatoes, pasta or just want some healthier choices, this selection will offer up some terrific options. Enjoy!

Here is a terrific side dish from cookbook author Leah Schapira with nary a potato in sight. Leah believes that a recipe doesn't have to be complicated to be delicious and this one has even passed the "kid taste test!" Passover is usually a carb-loaded holiday so this roasted vegetable melange is a wonderful way to lighten up somewhat on Passover for the whole family.

Leah Schapira's website is www.cookkosher.com. She writes: "If you're trying to watch your waistline, this side dish may help a bit. I'm not big into tricking my kids and I prefer telling them what they are eating, but when I made this, my children assumed it was potatoes and sweet potatoes. They ate peacefully and filled up. Only the one with finer taste buds realized something was different."

ORANGE-GLAZED ROOT VEGETABLES

Adapted from Fresh & Easy Kosher Cooking by Leah Schapira (Artscroll)

2 parsnips
2 sweet potatoes
1 large turnip
2 carrots
1 medium celery knob
3 tbsp. orange juice
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. salt
pinch black pepper

Preheat oven to 475. Line a baking sheet with foil or parchment paper. Peel all vegetables and cut into evenly sized chunks (about 1-inch).

In a large bowl, toss vegetables with the juice, oil, sugar, salt and pepper. Spread vegetables on baking sheet. Bake for 1 hour or until vegetables are tender. Yield: 4 to 6 servings. This recipe multiplies easily.

Cookbook author Levana Kirschenbaum loves to play the "move-over-potatoes" game. She writes: "Not because I don't love them, but more because I can enjoy them only occasionally. I am confident that you will concur. This recipe will move effortlessly from your stepchild "restricted" list to your A-list, just because it's perfectly delicious. Wait until you see all the variations you can play with! I love to use frozen veggies because they are all ready to go, clean, and full of flavour and with all their nutrition intact, but of course you can use fresh." BROCCOLI CAULIFLOWER KUGEL

Adapted from the newly published and redesigned Whole Foods Kosher Kitchen: Glorious Meals Pure & Simple by Lemana Kirschenbaum.

5 cups frozen broccoli florets
5 cups frozen cauliflower florets
1 medium onion, quartered
6 eggs
1 cup white wine or water or a combination
1/2 cup potato starch
1/3 cup olive oil
salt and pepper to taste
good pinch nutmeg
1/2 tsp. dried thyme or ground bay leaves
1 tsp. turmeric, optional

Preheat oven to 375. In a food processor, coarsely grind the vegetables. Transfer the mixture to a bowl and add all remaining ingredients, combining thoroughly.

Pour the mixture into a greased 11x14-in. baking pan. Bake about 40 minutes, or a little longer until the top is barely firm. Serve hot. Room temperature will be good too. Makes 8 servings.

Variations: In addition to – or instead of – part or all of the cauliflower and broccoli, consider these possibilities, in equal parts – all equally good and exciting: frozen chopped spinach or kale, thawed and squeezed dry; grated carrots; sweet potatoes; kabocha squash; potatoes; zucchini; parsnips; celery root, etc.

Vary the seasonings according to the selection: use cinnamon, ginger, dill, oregano, etc.

Sautéed mushrooms (these must be sautéed first, or they will release too much moisture and throw off the good liquid-solid balance).

Make it into individual servings: pour the batter into greased muffin moulds and bake 30 minutes or a little longer, until the tops are set.

Craving pasta? Why not make up a batch of Pesach noodles! Kids, guests, husbands – everyone loves to nosh on these, so if you want to save them for the soup course, make them late at night or when you're home alone!

CRISPY POTATO ROAST

Source: The Complete, Informative and Inspirational Bais Yaakov Cookbook: 200 recipes to uplift and enhance your Shabbos, Yom Tov and Everyday Table

A potato is a potato is a potato. Well, that's what I thought until I tasted this! Imagine a potato that is not fried and absurdly delicious. Who would believe?

6 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil, divided coarse salt
1/2-1 tsp. red pepper flakes
4 lb. Yukon gold potatoes, peeled
4 shallots, peeled
8 sprigs thyme

Preheat oven to 375. With a sharp knife or mandolin (or use the slicing blade of your food processor), slice potatoes very thinly. Place about 1 tbsp. of extra-virgin olive oil on the bottom of a 9-in. oven-to-table dish and spread it evenly. Sprinkle a few pinches of coarse salt over oil; this will allow you to season both the top and bottom of the potatoes. Arrange your potato slices vertically in the dish, so the edges, not the flat sides, are up.

Thinly slice shallots with a sharp knife or a mandolin. Place shallot slivers between potato slices, distributing them as evenly as possible. Brush with remaining 5 tbsp oil. Generously season with salt, lightly season with paprika. Bake 1-1/4 hours. Makes 10 servings.

Yes, we have frogs, locusts, wild animals, & of course our famous selection of truffles, barks, mints, & brittles.

And all of this Kosher for Passover.

Sweet treats for Passover

Rivka Tal
Special to The CJN

These days, when all manner of Passover candies and treats are available, even at local supermarkets, not to mention "kosher" stores, we take their availability for granted. But years ago (not even that many years!), there were limited options for ready-made sweets and treats that were kosher for Pesach.

Various forms of carrot candies were popular, often flavoured with ginger. And cocoa and chocolate have been available for Pesach for a long time, so they were useful ingredients to satisfy the children's (and the adults'!) sweet tooth. The ginger cookies called ingberlach in Yiddish were a popular sweet, as were various nut and/or date or other dried fruit mixtures, depending on availability of kosher for Pesach ingredients. Try these for old-fashioned flavour.

INGBERLACH

Ingber means "ginger" in Yiddish.

1 lb. carrots
2 cups sugar
1/2 cup chopped walnuts or pecans
1/4 tsp. ground ginger

Peel the carrots, then grate them on a fine grater. Put the grated carrots and sugar in a heavy pan over the lowest possible heat. Stir contents constantly until the sugar has dissolved.

Rinse an 8x12-inch jelly roll pan under running water and keep it damp

Continue to cook the carrots, stirring frequently, until the mixture is thick and forms a ball, about 10 minutes.

Test the mixture by dropping a spoonful into a cup of cold water; if it sets hard as it touches the water, candy is ready.

Remove the pan from the heat and immediately stir in the nuts and ginger

Pour the mixture quickly onto the damp surface of the jellyroll pan

Cut into 1-inch diamonds or squares before completely hardened. Let dry for 30 minutes to 1 hour. Remove with a spatula.

CHEWY CHOCOLATE TREAT

10 oz. bittersweet chocolate or chocolate chips
1 1/2 cups toasted matzah farfel
3/4 cups toasted chopped walnuts
1/4 cup dried apricots or cranberries
1/4 cup chopped marshmallows
1/4 cup golden raisins

Melt chocolate over very low heat, stirring until smooth. Mix in remaining ingredients.

Line a jelly roll pan with parchment paper. Drop tablespoons of chocolate mixture onto paper. Refrigerate until hard. Store in freezer until serving.

DRIED FRUIT-WHITE CHOCOLATE CONFECTIONS

Years ago, there were no silicon pans, much less microwaves, but this recipe is simple as well as delicious.

8 oz. white chocolate, broken into squares
1/2 cup mixed dried fruit, cut into small pieces

Melt chocolate squares in a microwave on low-medium power, carefully stirring every 15 seconds or so with a wooden spoon.

Scatter dried fruit into 12 round silicon compartments. Fill compartments immediately with melted chocolate. Freeze. Release from pan when frozen, and serve immediately.

Some new ideas to try

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

Passover has always tested the ingenuity of even the most creative of Jewish cooks. There are some who, either as a way of "solving the problem" or because they like the tradition of it, serve the same dishes each year on Passover. But I think that most of us like to mix the traditional with the new.

There are certain dishes, such as my matzah balls, matzah brie and brisket, that are on my menu every year, and I wouldn't change these recipes for anything. But beyond my few must-haves I am always looking for new and interesting dishes to serve.

On a recent visit to the States, my favorite foodie friend Shelly Shaw and I sat discussing Passover and Passover recipes, even though it was just February. Shelly is a fabulous cook, and when she tells me that a recipe is good, I know it will be. The first two recipes below are ones she gave me that I can't wait to try this Passover.

PASSOVER APPLE RHUBARB COBBLER

Rhubarb generally comes on the market around Passover time and this dish is a great introduction to rhubarb season.

Crumble Topping:
1 1/2 cups potato starch
1 cup matzah meal
1/3 cup brown sugar
2 tsp. Passover vanilla sugar pinch of ground cinnamon
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 cup unsalted Passover margarine or unsalted butter
1/4 cup orange juice

Apple Rhubarb Filling:
6 cups peeled and sliced apples
1 cup coarsely chopped rhubarb
3/4 cup sugar
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/4 cup orange juice
2 tbsp. potato starch

Preheat oven to 350. Generously grease a 9x13-in. or 8x10-in. rectangular pan, or a 10-in. springform pan.

Make topping: in a medium bowl, combine the dry ingredients. Cut the margarine or butter into the dry mixture. Stir in the orange juice to make a crumbly topping that just holds together. Set aside.

In a large bowl, toss all the filling ingredients together.

Sprinkle half the crumble topping over the bottom of the pan and press very slightly. Spoon the fruit filling over this. Sprinkle the remaining crumble topping over the fruit. Bake until the fruit is bubbling and the top is lightly golden (25 to 35 minutes). Cool well in the pan before serving.

Variation: You can substitute cranberries or raspberries for the rhubarb for rosy or tart filling, or substitute apricots (fresh or canned) for a sweeter filling. Serves 12 or more.

EGGPLANT PARMESAN

It is very important not to skip salting and draining the eggplants. This step prevents the eggplant from absorbing the oil and tasting greasy.

2 medium eggplants, cut into 1/2-in. slices
salt for sprinkling
2 eggs, beaten
2/3 cup matzah meal or potato flour
oil for frying
11 oz. marinara sauce or 1 11-oz. can tomato-mushroom sauce and 1/3 cup water, optional, mixed with sauce
salt and pepper to taste
1 8-oz. package sliced Swiss cheese
1/2 cup grated Parmesan cheese

Sprinkle eggplant with salt. Let stand for 30 minutes. Rinse slightly and dry. Dip slices in beaten eggs, then in matzah meal or potato flour. Fry on both sides until fork tender. Combine sauce with water and seasonings.

In a greased, 2-quart casserole, place a little sauce, a layer of fried eggplant, and a layer of sliced cheese. Repeat, ending with sauce. Sprinkle with Parmesan cheese. Bake in a preheated 350-degree oven for 30 minutes. Serves 8.

The Kosher Consumer Has A Choice

MAZEL WINES started in the 60's when it was all but impossible to purchase high quality Kosher wines in Toronto. Since then, owner and operator Mrs. Beila Adler, has fought and won the right to expand the selection and variety of wines that we enjoy today.

Providing the Jewish community with quality service, as well as quality product, is the Mazel Wines priority. With over 40 years of unique experience, educating the consumer is a responsibility they take very seriously. Mrs. Adler pulls out a creased piece of paper with a few typed sentences on it. "I read this somewhere, I can't recall where, but it has become our motto," she explains. It reads: "Excellence is more than just a word. It is a commitment in our relationship with our clients, our employees and our community. We strive to promote and encourage excellence within and beyond our company.

"If you make a simcha," Mrs. Adler says, "I will not just say, 'Go to the store and buy my wines.' No. You come here, we sit down with you." Mazel Wines has experts (and the expertise) to help not only select the appropriate wines and liquors, but also help plan the occasion, from picking the wines to choosing the after dinner liqueurs.

"As an established, registered agent," says Mrs. Adler, "we work together with the LCBO to have a sizable number of fine kosher wines and spirits available. This year for Purim and Pesach we have Les Floreales Moscato, rated best in quality and very competitively priced at $11.95. There's also Armon Kosher for Passover Vodka, and the Armon Cream Rose (9% alcohol content) is a fruity, mild wine that's perfect for the seder."

Although Mrs. Adler insists that her role is to help her customers enjoy the greatest selection and quality of wines available, her favourite role is in helping people by offering convenience and the benefit of her expertise. "We service our clients with the whole package, including purchasing all of the wines, liqueurs and liquor for their simcha. We are, in essence, a one-stop provider with the expertise to advise on what wine is best suited to the food being served and to advise on what quantities are needed."

Baking your own matzah: with community or at home

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

The author joins in at the Shoresh Food Conference matzah-baking workshop.

If you've never baked your own matzah before, you should. It's certainly fast – from raw ingredients to burnt-to-a-crisp goodness in under 20 minutes. Rachael Cayley, co-organizer of the annual community Matzah Bake in Dufferin Grove Park in Toronto, says it's easy, too: "If you don't usually bake, follow the instructions and you'll be fine; if you usually bake, ignore your intuitions."

For experienced bread bakers, flat, tasteless bread would be considered a failure. Their goal is usually to produce something delicious – but that's the opposite of matzah, which, says Cayley, a lecturer at University of Toronto, offers "sustenance without pleasure – it reminds us of sacrifice and suffering, the distance between freedom and enslavement. Challah is ego, but matzah is humility."

The great news is that you barely need a recipe. Cayley and her husband, Mitch Davis, who runs the annual Matzah Bake, led a hands-on matzah workshop as part of the Shoresh Food Conference in early February, long before most of us were thinking about matzah at all. The conference was one of the Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs, an organization established in 2002 as part of the Jewish environmental movement in the Greater Toronto Area.

The top-secret formula: 1 cup of flour (whole wheat, white or a mixture), along with 1/3 of a cup of water (add gradually, starting with 1/4 cup and add more as needed). The water should be cool, preferably spring water that has been left out overnight.

Davis said Jewish sources explain that dough is considered "leaven" after 18 minutes from the flour's first contact with the water. "That's not a chai thing," Davis said, referring to the number 18, but rather, the time it takes for the flour to begin fermentation.

For matzah to be used on Pesach, it can't have come in contact with any leaven. Implements and surfaces used with the dough must be spotlessly clean: in bakeries, all equipment is cleaned thoroughly between batches. There are also issues with the flour: it is generally watched either from the time of harvest or the time of milling to ensure that it stays absolutely dry.

At the workshop, held in the kitchen of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, an iPod counted down the minutes as participants kneaded flour and water into a very stiff dough, rolled it out paper-thin, then scored the surface with a fork before arranging the matzah "boards" on aluminum foil baking pans, and baked at 500 degrees for six to 10 minutes. Amazingly, by the time the alarm rang, almost everybody was holding some very hand-made-looking, plain-tasting results.

Cayley said it's odd, especially for home cooks who pride themselves on making their own food, to not think about making this ritual food, so central to the holiday table. As well, tying into the Shoresh conference's theme of reconciling food ethics with Jewish tradition, families who normally emphasize locally sourced, organic foods may be uncomfortable with mass-produced matzahs.

Davis sources local, organic flour or wheat berries (to grind at home) for those interested in negotiating the complicated halachic hurdles of making their own matzah for Pesach.

"It's a matter of deciding what works, what matters for you," Cayley said.

They also pointed out that, while most of us use the word flour synonymously with wheat flour, matzah can be made, according to Jewish law, with flour of any five specific grain species: wheat, oats, barley, spelt and rye. Just don't add salt, rabbinically thought to enhance fermentation (and perhaps a bit of flavour).

If you're too timid to try it at home, you're still invited to the community Matzah Bake in Dufferin Grove Park, which attracts Jews of different observance and knowledge levels. This is the 15th year for the event, which began just a few years after the park's wood-burning pizza oven was set up. "There were three people at that first bake," Davis said. "Last year, there were 50 or 60."

He began as a volunteer one year. At the end, the person organizing told him she'd be away the following year and asked if he'd like to run it; this is his fifth year at the helm.

"You get people wandering by, saying, 'What's this?' They don't know what matzah is."

Everybody's welcome to try baking and sharing stories with Jews and non-Jews alike. "Community happens around a wood oven."

Join in this year's Matzah Bake (BYOT – bring your own timer!) on Sunday, April 1, from noon to 3 p.m. in Dufferin Grove Park, on Dufferin Street, just south of Bloor, across from Dufferin Mall. Suggested donation (to cover expenses): $5-10 per family. For more information, e-mail mitchdavis@rogers.com or visit http://www.facebook.com/DufferinGroveParkMatzahBake.

Desserts to put a smile on your face

Baking, no matter what time of year it is, should be fun, enticing and easy. Above all, the end result should be captivating and delicious.

Over the past number of years, several novels have been penned based on the premise that anything the heroine cooks or bakes reflects what she was feeling at the time. If she was sad, her cakes have a bittersweetness to them. If happy, her casseroles sing and her cookies bring smiles to those who eat them. That kind of power, you might conclude, is the stuff of imagination and literary whim. But I don't think so. Maybe it's because I'm so content when I'm baking or cooking, but I really do believe that if you're happy, then your cookies, cakes actually do taste better.

VANILLA BEAN CHEESECAKE WITH MANGO PEACH SAUCE

In a pinch, drained yogurt can be used to replace the sour cream. You can also use light sour cream but not the no-fat variety, which contains too much water. The almonds in the crust pair beautifully with the tang of the vanilla and the fruit in the sauce.

Crust:
1 cup ground almonds
3 tbsp. light brown sugar
2 tbsp. potato starch
3 tbsp. unsalted butter, melted
Filling:
1 lb. cream cheese, softened
3/4 cup granulated sugar
1 vanilla bean (or 1 tbsp. vanilla powder)
3 eggs
pinch salt
3 cups sour cream
Mango Peach Sauce:
2 tbsp. unsalted butter
1/3 cup packed light brown sugar
pinch each ground ginger and cinnamon
3 cups frozen peach slices
2 cups frozen mango slices or chunks
1/3 cup peach, mango or fruit juice
1 tsp. potato starch

Preheat oven to 325. In bowl, combine almonds, sugar and potato starch. Stir in butter until well moistened. Pat crust onto bottom of lightly greased 8-1/2-in. springform pan. Place pan on large piece of aluminum foil; press foil tightly to outer sides of pan. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 10 minutes. Set aside.

Meanwhile, using stand-up mixer and paddle attachment or hand-held beaters, beat cream cheese with sugar until fluffy. Cut vanilla bean in half lengthwise. With small paring knife, scrape out seeds. Add seeds to cream cheese mixture. Add eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Scrape down sides of bowl. Blend in sour cream. Pour batter over crust in prepared pan.

Place pan in large roasting pan; pour in enough hot water to come 1-inch up sides of springform. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 60 to 70 minutes or until edges are set but centre still jiggles slightly. Turn off oven. Let cake cool in oven for 1 hour. Remove to rack; let cool completely. Cover loosely and refrigerate for at least 24 hours or for up to 3 days.

Sauce: In large skillet set over medium heat, melt butter. Stir in sugar, ginger and cinnamon until bubbly. Add peaches and mangos, stirring until well coated. Dissolve potato starch in 1 tbsp. water; pour into skillet along with juice. Bring to boil; reduce heat slightly and boil gently for 2 to 3 minutes until liquid is slightly thickened and fruit is tender. Chill. (Sauce can be made ahead and refrigerated for up to 3 days). Bring to room temperature before serving with cake.

Slice cake into wedges. Serve with sauce. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

CRANBERRY CHOCOLATE SORBET WITH CRANBERRY RASPBERRY COULIS

The cranberry raspberry coulis is quite tart, which helps tone down the intense sweetness and strong chocolate taste of the sorbet. It is beautiful paired with any sorbet, matzah brei or any other dessert.

6 oz. unsweetened chocolate, finely chopped
1 cup granulated sugar
1/2 cup dried cranberries
2 tbsp. frozen cranberry cocktail or juice concentrate Sauce:
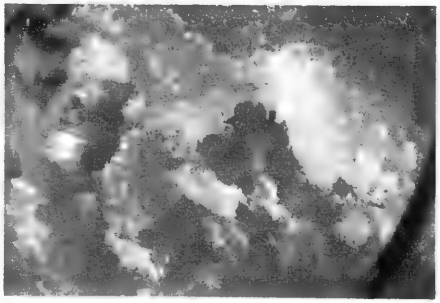
3 cups frozen cranberries



2 cups frozen raspberries
1/4 cup granulated sugar
1 tbsp. potato starch

In saucepan set over medium heat, combine chocolate, sugar and 2 cups water. Bring to a boil, stirring constantly. Reduce heat to low; simmer, stirring constantly, until completely smooth and slightly thickened, about 8 minutes. Remove from heat; let cool to room temperature. Stir in cranberries and concentrate.

If making in ice cream or sorbet machine, freeze according to manufacturer's directions. Or, transfer mixture to 8-inch square baking pan. Freeze, stirring every 20 minutes, until frozen. Freeze overnight. Before serving, defrost for 20 minutes. Cut into chunks; buzz in food processor until smooth.

Sauce: In saucepan, combine cranberries, raspberries, sugar, 1/3 cup water and potato starch. Bring to boil; reduce heat and simmer for 3 to 5 minutes or until cranberries have burst, raspberries have broken down and liquid is thickened. Transfer mixture to food processor; process until pureed. Strain through fine mesh sieve, pressing with a wooden spoon to extract all of the liquid. (Sauce can be refrigerated covered for up to 4 days.)

Serve sauce drizzled over sorbet. Makes 6 servings.

Note: The following recipe is considered kitniyot, and therefore suitable only for Sephardim.

PEANUTTY CHOCOLATE CHIP TOFFEE COOKIES

These cookies, perfect straight out of the oven, actually get softer as they sit at room temperature in an airtight container.

1/2 cup unsalted butter or margarine
1/2 cup packed light brown sugar
1/4 cup granulated sugar
1 egg
2 tsp. vanilla powder
3/4 cup matzah cake meal
1/4 cup potato starch
1/2 tsp. each baking soda and salt
1 cups semisweet chocolate chips
1/2 cup unsalted peanuts, coarsely chopped
1/3 cup finely chopped toffee bits or chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 350. Using stand-up mixer fitted with paddle or hand-held beaters, beat butter with brown and granulated sugar until fluffy. Beat in egg. Beat in vanilla powder. With wooden spoon, stir in matzah cake meal, potato starch, soda and salt. Stir in chocolate chips, peanuts and toffee. Drop heaping tablespoonfuls onto parchment paper-lined baking sheets. Bake in centre of preheated oven, one tray at a time, for about 8 minutes or just until golden. Cool on pan on rack for 5 minutes. Remove to rack to cool completely. (Cookies can be stored at room temperature in an airtight container for up to 10 days). Makes about 3 dozen cookies.

Suggestions for breadless lunches

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Whether you're packing lunch for your kids at school or a brown bagger yourself, sandwiches, with the dizzying array of breads and rolls on the market today, is a smorgasbord of options and possibilities.

During Passover, though, when breadstuffs are prohibited, lunches can still enjoy the same landscape of choices, given some ingenuity and creativity.

Matzah makes for a great foundation for any kind of pizza meal, and greens of any fashion can do double duty as the "bread" holding a sandwich together. Make a double batch of the caramelized onions and roasted tomatoes to splurge on during the eight-day holiday. Both condiments are wonderful not only on matzah but fabulous served with chicken, over fish and with any kind of roast.

The fennel salad is highly portable, but also fancy enough to please a crowd. The feta and pine nut spread should be served at room temperature, which will make it easy to spread over lettuce, matzah or even raw vegetables. The tuna-filled avocado can be made ahead as well – just be sure to rub or brush lemon juice over the flesh of the avocado to prevent it from browning.

CARMELIZED ONIONS AND OVEN ROASTED TOMATOES ON MATZAH WITH CHEESE

Although these tomatoes take some time to roast in the oven, they're well worth the effort. Double or even triple the recipe so you can have them on hand for more than one meal. Similarly, caramelized onions pair perfectly with just about anything – chicken, turkey, scrambled eggs, you name it – so you can never have enough of those on hand either!

Oven-Roasted Tomatoes
1-1/2 lb. fresh ripe plum tomatoes (about 5)
1 tbsp. sherry or balsamic vinegar
2 cloves garlic, minced
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
2 tbsp. olive oil

Caramelized Onions
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
4 onions, sliced
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
2 sheets regular matzah
2/3 cup shredded Meunster cheese

Preheat oven to 300. Slice tomatoes lengthwise. Place cut side up on aluminum foil-lined rimmed baking sheet. In small bowl, whisk together vinegar, garlic, salt, pepper and olive oil; drizzle evenly over tomatoes. Roast in centre of preheated oven for about 1-1/2 hours or until very tender and golden around edges. (Tomatoes can be cooled and refrigerated, covered for up to 5 days).

Meanwhile, heat olive oil in skillet set over medium-high heat. Add onions, salt and pepper. Cook, stirring, for 5 minutes. Reduce heat to medium; cook for 20 to 30 minutes or until deep golden.

Place matzah on rimmed baking sheet. Place 5 tomatoes halves over each piece. Smash lightly. Top evenly with caramelized onions. Sprinkle cheese evenly over. Broil for 3 to 5 minutes or until cheese is melted. Makes 2 to 4 servings.

Sweets made with Passover marshmallows

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

Marshmallows are a sweet, spongy candy that's delicious straight from the bag. However, in dessert recipes, marshmallows are quite often used melted as the glue that holds the ingredients together.

Additionally, marshmallows are the time-honoured camping treat roasted on a wooden stick over the campfire. The marshmallows that we know today are usually made from sugar, corn syrup, gelatin, water and flavourings.

But this was not always the case. Marshmallows have a proud history in the candy world. Originally produced as a medicine, the main ingredients were taken from the marsh mallow plant, harvested from salt marshes near the sea in Africa and West Asia. Sap and occasionally the pith of the plant were extracted, a labour-intensive endeavour, and whipped until foamy. The foam was left to dry and then used as an anti-inflammatory remedy for sore throats, as well as therapy for other ailments. Early 19th-century candy makers added the marshmallow to their inventory as a confection by whipping the marsh mallow plant ingredients with sugar and egg whites.

This modern marshmallow was still extremely labour intensive, and a better way to make it was devised. Candy makers found that with the addition of gelatin in place of the marsh mallow sap, the marshmallows of today stay thick, spongy and flavourful. But let us not forget the marsh mallow plant. Its medicinal side can still be found today in herbal anti-inflammatory treatments at health food stores.

Marshmallows can play a big role at Passover as a delicious snack or for their adhesive properties. Producers of kosher marshmallows pride themselves on providing the consumer excellent fresh marshmallows that are also kosher for Passover. They achieve this by using kosher fish gelatin and replacing the corn starch and syrup with glucose and tapioca starch. So, creating unique Passover desserts is in the bag, in the bag of Passover marshmallows!

BANANA CAKE WITH TOASTED COCONUT MARSHMALLOW TOPPING

This delightful cake is comparable to the hummingbird cake, a cake popular in the southern U.S. states. It is said that the hummingbird cake is so delicious it makes you hum with happiness. Possibly the cake is so named because it is sweet enough for hummingbirds, so that people hover around the cake similar to the way hummingbirds hover around flowers. Perhaps it was named after the way the cake draws people in and they eat quickly, similar to the eating habits of those tiny, lively little birds. Either way, one and all will linger around your dessert table.

Cake:
7 eggs, separated
1 cup sugar, divided
4 large ripe bananas, mashed
3/4 cup cake meal
1/4 cup potato starch
1/2 tsp. salt
1 can (14 oz.) pineapple tidbits, or similar, very well drained (reserve 1/3 cup of pineapple for topping)
Topping:
1/2 cup margarine
1 cup sugar
2 eggs, beaten
1 package (10 oz.) Passover toasted coconut marshmallows
1/3 cup pineapple tidbits

Cake

Grease a tube pan with margarine, and preheat oven to 325.

Beat egg whites with clean, dry beaters until soft peaks form. Gradually add 1/2 cup sugar and beat egg whites until stiff peaks form. Set aside.

Beat egg yolks and remaining sugar until light yellow. Add bananas and beat well. Mix in the cake meal, potato starch and salt to egg yolk and banana mixture, combine well.

Fold 1/4 of the egg whites into mixture and combine well. Gently fold the remainder of the egg whites into mixture until well combined. Fold in pineapple tidbits. Pour into prepared tube pan.

Simple treat makes a delicious dessert

Bake for one hour. Cool in pan over a cooling rack. To remove from pan run a small offset spatula around the outside and the inside of the pan. Gently shake until cake bounces. Hold a platter over the top of the tube pan and invert.

Topping

In top of a double boiler, melt butter; add sugar and eggs. Cook over the boiling water, whisking continuously for 10 minutes*. Add toasted coconut marshmallows and stir until melted. Remove from heat. Stir in remaining pineapple tidbits. Cool.

*If you find any cooked egg pieces in mixture, strain them out before adding marshmallows.

To Assemble

Place strips of parchment paper on platter around cake to catch any drips from topping. Cut cake in half horizontally. Carefully remove the top of the cake and spoon about half of the topping over the middle of the cake. Replace the top and spoon the remaining topping over the top layer and let it run down the sides. Cool, pull away parchment paper.

PASSOVER MOLTEN CHOCOLATE LAVA CAKES

The chocolate lava cake is one of the trendiest desserts to hit dessert menus everywhere. Whoever it was that removed a chocolate cake from the oven too soon, to discover that it was completely baked on the outside and still warm and gooey on the inside was brilliant! The marshmallows make this dessert more decadent than ever.

12 oz. bittersweet chocolate, chopped
3/4 cup margarine, plus extra to grease ramekins
6 eggs, separated into two large bowls
1 cup sugar, divided
2 tsp. vanilla
10 Passover marshmallows

Preheat oven to 350. Prepare 10 1/2-cup ramekins by greasing with margarine. Fill one or two large Pyrex dishes 1/4 full with water and place on middle rack in oven. In a large glass bowl, melt chocolate and margarine in microwave for 90 seconds. Stir with a fork until all the chocolate is melted and the mixture is well combined. Set aside to cool, stirring occasionally.

With clean, dry beaters beat egg whites until soft peaks form. Gradually add 1/2 cup of sugar and beat until stiff peaks form. Set aside.

Beat egg yolks and remaining sugar until mixture is thick and light yellow. Add vanilla and combine into mixture. Fold the chocolate mixture into the egg yolk mixture, making sure it is well combined. Fold 1/4 of the egg whites into the chocolate mixture, combine well, and gently fold in the remaining egg whites until well combined. Spoon batter into ramekins about half-way to the top.

Place a marshmallow in the centre of each ramekin and cover with batter to just below the top. Place ramekins in the Pyrex dish(es) in the oven, and bake for 35 minutes, or until the cakes puff up over the top of the ramekin and start to crack. Carefully remove Pyrex dish(es) from oven, and with a tongs carefully remove ramekins from water. Cool 3-5 minutes before serving.

CHOCOLATE MALLOW NUT ROLL

Simply Fun!

2 cups walnuts or pecans
12 oz. chocolate, chopped
1 tsp. oil
1 package Passover toasted coconut marshmallows
1 cup dried apricots baking sheets
parchment paper, 2 pieces about 16 inches in length

Preheat oven to 350. Place 2 cups of nuts on parchment-covered baking sheet and toast in oven for 5-7 minutes. Watch that nuts do not burn. Cool.

Melt chocolate in the microwave for 90 seconds. Stir with a fork until completely melted and smooth. Add the oil and combine. Cool chocolate for 5 minutes, stirring occasionally.

Cut the marshmallows in half and then cut each half into 4 pieces. Do the same with the apricots. Add the marshmallows and apricots to the melted chocolate and combine well. Place parchment paper over a baking sheet. Spoon mixture over the middle of a length of parchment paper. Fold the parchment paper over the chocolate mixture.

By compressing the parchment paper form the chocolate mixture so that it becomes a roll, approximately 12 inches long and 3 inches wide. Prepare another piece of parchment paper and lay 1 cup of nuts along the middle. Transfer the roll over the nuts and place the remaining nuts on top. Again wrap parchment around the roll and compress the nuts into the mixture. Wrap well and place in the refrigerator until it becomes solid. To serve, using a serrated knife, slice the roll into "cookie-size portions.

EU moves to cut Iranian bank transfers

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israeli Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz on Sunday welcomed the exclusion of Iranian banks from international financial transfer networks.

The decision deals "a tough blow to Iran's economy" and "makes the import and export of oil very difficult," he told reporters before the weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem.

"This thing can cause the collapse of the Iranian economy. Is it enough? I don't know. Is it significant and will it affect their endurance? Without a doubt it is a very dramatic step," he said.

All Iranian banks that were already subject to a freeze on their EU-held assets are affected, including the central bank and several commercial lenders.

EU countries agreed to the measure March 15 as part of efforts alongside the United States to pressure Iran into backing down on its nuclear program, which the West suspects is of a military nature but which Iran insists is strictly peaceful.

Yuval Steinitz

The Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication (SWIFT), an international network that controls the world's largest financial messaging system, announced March 15 it intended to cut off Iranian banks targeted by European Union sanctions.

The move was an unprecedented measure that will effectively prevent Iranian institutions from electronically transferring global funds.

In a statement March 15, SWIFT said financial institutions hit by EU measures would be removed from the network as of Saturday, March 17.

"The new European Council decision, as confirmed by the Belgian Treasury, prohibits companies such as SWIFT to continue to provide specialized financial messaging services to EU-sanctioned Iranian banks," the statement said, adding that "SWIFT is incorporated under Belgian law and has to comply with this decision as confirmed by its home country government."

SWIFT CEO Lázaro Campos said that the EU decision to sanction Iranian banks forced "SWIFT to take action," adding, "Disconnecting banks is an extraordinary and unprecedented step for SWIFT. It is a direct result of international and multilateral action to intensify financial sanctions against Iran."

An Israeli official indicated that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu raised the issue of disconnecting the Iranian banks from the SWIFT system during his recent conversations with U.S. President Barack Obama as well as with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. According to the official, Netanyahu told Obama that "we need SWIFT swiftly."

In response to SWIFT's announcement, the Prime Minister's Office released a statement later in the day, saying that "prime minister Netanyahu congratulated SWIFT for its decision to cut the Iranian banks from the system."

In December, EU foreign ministers adopted new sanctions against Iran in response to the country's nuclear program.

Convicted death camp guard Demjanjuk dead at 91

Ofer Aderet
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

MUNICH — Convicted Nazi death camp guard John Demjanjuk, 91, has died in a retirement home in southern Germany, police said Saturday.

Last year, a German court found the retired Ohio autoworker guilty of aiding in the murder of 27,900 Jews at Sobibor, a Nazi extermination camp in occupied Poland, over several months of 1943.

The Munich court initially sentenced Demjanjuk to five years in jail, but then decided to release him pending an appeal, due to his advanced age.

Demjanjuk had been exonerated in a separate Holocaust trial two decades ago in Israel, where he was initially sentenced to death for being the notorious "Ivan the Terrible" camp guard at Treblinka in Poland. Israel's Supreme Court overturned the ruling after new evidence exonerated him.

Holocaust survivors welcomed the guilty verdict, as did the Nazi-hunting Simon Wiesenthal Center, where Rabbi Marvin Hier said: "John Demjanjuk's Nazi past finally caught up with him."

"Humanity owed this to the memory of the tortured and the dead," Elan Steinberg of the American Gathering of Holocaust Survivors and their Descendants said, adding his "cynical manipulation of the legal system has at last been ended".

John Demjanjuk

The Ukraine-born Demjanjuk, who once topped the Simon Wiesenthal Center's list of most wanted Nazi war criminals, said he was drafted into the Soviet army in 1941 then taken as a prisoner of war by the Germans.

Demjanjuk attended the 18-month court proceedings in Munich – birthplace of Adolf Hitler's Nazi movement – in a wheelchair and sometimes lying down, with his family trying to argue that he was too frail to stand trial.

His son, John Demjanjuk Jr., said in an e-mail ahead of the verdict that his father was a victim of the Nazis and of postwar Germany.

"While those who refuse to accept that reality may take satisfaction from this event, nothing the Munich court can do will atone for the suffering Germany has perpetrated upon him to this day," he said.

Prosecutors had faced several hurdles in proving Demjanjuk's guilt, with no surviving witnesses to his crimes and heavy reliance on wartime documents, namely a Nazi ID card that defence attorneys said was a fake made by the Soviets.

Guards at Nazi death camps such as Sobibor were essential to the mass killing of Jews, because extermination was the focus of such camps, prosecutors said. Some 250,000 Jews were killed at Sobibor, according to the Wiesenthal Center.

According to a German newspaper, Demjanjuk will be buried in Germany where the state will pay for his burial.

In an initial response to his death, Demjanjuk Jr. said his father "died as a victim of Soviet and German brutality that he suffered through since childhood."

"He loved life, his family and humans," Demjanjuk Jr. said. "History will prove that Germany used him as a scapegoat when it placed responsibility for Nazi crimes on a helpless Ukrainian prisoner of war."

Prof. Cornelius Nestler of Cologne University, who represented the victims' families in the trial, told Ha'aretz over the weekend that his clients "received what they had expected from his conviction, that he was held accountable for accessory to murder of their parents and siblings in Sobibor."

Despite the fact that there will be no appeal on Demjanjuk's appeal, Nestler believes that such an appeal "never had a chance to succeed."

"The evidence is clear," he said. "John Demjanjuk was a guard in Sobibor.

"I hope that the written verdict of the district court in Munich, which summarizes all the evidence and makes clear that Demjanjuk participated in the mass murder in Sobibor, will find the attention it deserves."

Correction

The March 8 article, "Cotler rejects 'Israeli apartheid' – in South Africa" incorrectly reported that Liberal member of Parliament Irwin Cotler was "lobbied" by senior government officials on Canada's visa policies preventing African National Congress members from visiting Canada. Also, his presentation to South African officials, rejecting the depiction of Israel as an apartheid state, was based on his view that such an allegation is fundamentally an insult to the anti-apartheid movement. He did not describe Israel as a bastion of human rights in those meetings. We regret the errors.

Eradicating racism

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at a meeting with Ethiopian community leaders said he was committed to stopping racism. "I asked for this meeting because I am committed to the Ethiopian immigrant public," Netanyahu said at last Wednesday's meeting. "One of the things that I cannot tolerate is displays of racism." Netanyahu told the Ethiopian leaders – social activists and community religious leaders – about plans by his government to help the Ethiopian community's integration into Israeli society. The government's five-year plan, according to the Prime Minister's Office, includes assistance in schools to boost achievements, promoting higher education and preventing dropouts, employment assistance and efforts to assist Ethiopian soldiers in the Israeli Defence Forces, and grants to assist in finding housing for those leaving absorption centres. The plan also includes the establishment of youth centres for Ethiopians and a move to memorialize those who died in Sudan as they tried to reach Israel. Netanyahu promised there would be more meetings with Ethiopian leaders.

Envoy's exit urged

The Egyptian parliament voted unanimously on a statement calling for the deportation of Israel's ambassador and stopping gas exports to Israel. The People's Assembly passed the resolution Monday night stating that the halting of gas exports is in protest against attacks by Israel on Gaza. The measure also called for the withdrawal of the Egyptian ambassador from Tel Aviv, according to the newspaper Al Masry Al Youm and a renewal of the Arab boycott against Israel. "Egypt after the revolution will never be a friend of the Zionist entity, the first enemy of Egypt and the Arab nation," the resolution reportedly said, and demanded that the Egyptian government review all its relations and agreements with that "enemy," according to Al Masry. The motion is largely symbolic, according to the Associated Press, because only the ruling Military Council, the country's current government, can make such decisions. People's Assembly Speaker Saad al-Katatny asked a special parliamentary committee to take the demands to the government, according to Al Masry.

Gunman kills four at Jewish school

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TOULOUSE, France — Four people were killed and another seriously wounded in a shooting at a Jewish high school in the southern French city of Toulouse, French media reported on Monday.

The shooting took place near a synagogue on the campus of the Ozar Hatorah school where children and their parents usually wait for a bus that takes them to the various Jewish preschools in the community. One victim, Jonathan Sandler, a Jewish studies teacher at the school, was waiting for the bus with his two children when the shooting occurred.

According to reports, a man riding a motorcycle opened fire at the children and the parents at around 8 a.m. The gunman then abandoned the motorcycle, entered the school and began shooting at the students and faculty.

French prosecutor Michel Valet said Monday that those killed were Sandler, 30, and his three-year-old and six-year-old sons. Valet said another child, between eight and 10 years old, was also killed, and a 17-year-old seriously wounded.

Baruch, Sandler's learning companion at the Judaic studies program at the Ozar Hatorah school, told Ha'aretz that he spoke to Sandler moments before the shooting.

"I saw him, greeted him, and left toward the school. Seconds later, I hear shots. I didn't turn around and started running toward the synagogue that is about 10 to 15 metres from the entrance gate," he said.

"Everyone started shouting, 'Shooting, shooting!' and fled. At some point, the shooter entered the school and began firing inside. We hid under the synagogue in a shed, until the police came and escorted us out."

French police said that the man opened fire with an automatic pistol of the same kind that was seen at two previous attacks on soldiers in Toulouse and the nearby town of Montauban, the report said. Three soldiers died in those two incidents, and one was seriously wounded.

Police closed off the street on which the school is located and deployed large forces at the scene. Some 50 French police officers were drafted into the investigation, including anti-terrorist officers, French media reported.

The French interior ministry has requested increased vigilance and surveillance in all of southwest France, particularly in the Jewish districts.

French President Nicolas Sarkozy cancelled other appointments and was on his way to Toulouse on Monday morning, accompanied by Education Minister Luc Chatel and the president of the CRIF French Jewish association, Richard Prasquier.

Jean-Yves Camus, a research associate with the Institute of International and Strategic Relations in France, told Ha'aretz, "The lone-wolf scenario seems the more likely, both in the case of the Toulouse shooting spree and in the cold-blooded murder of French servicemen, who belonged to an elite unit having fought in Afghanistan."

"One interesting point in those murders is that all soldiers belonged to an ethnic minority, three were from North Africa and one was from the West Indies. Until now, experts have agreed that the French neo-Nazi scene, while it is much appreciative of [Anders] Breivik's killing in Norway [Breivik bombed government buildings in Oslo last year, resulting in eight deaths] and often refers to the "lone-wolf" or leaderless resistance modes of action, do not have the capability of committing such actions."

Ozar Hatorah is a religious school that, according to its website, aims to provide its students with a balanced education that will enable them to integrate fully into civil society, to "form the French citizens of tomorrow, in harmony with their Judaism."

According to a member of the community, the Jews in Toulouse see the Ozar Hatorah school as the centre of their community. Toulouse is home to a community of 25,000 Jews.

'Abominable drama'

David Koschitzky, chair of Canada's Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said in a statement that the "Canadian Jewish community shares the terrible pain of the families of the victims of the massacre at Ozar Hatorah. This crime is all the more grotesque because the murderer targeted children.

"We are confident that French authorities will do everything necessary to identify and bring to justice those responsible."

Sarkozy said Monday that the shooting was an "abominable drama and a frightening tragedy." He cancelled his appointments and left for Toulouse, accompanied by Education Minister Luc Chatel and CRIF president Richard Prasquier.

Sarkozy and Socialist presidential nominee François Hollande announced the suspension of the election campaign.

French police heightened security around Jewish schools across France, closing streets.

The president met with local police officers. Speaking in Toulouse, he said that "the investigation will be completed in its entirety. Whoever did it was crazy to murder Jewish children."

The commander of the local police said they didn't yet have a lead, but that a suspicious white car was seen at the scene of the crime.

Sarkozy said that on Tuesday, students in every school in France were to stand for a moment of silence for the victims of the Toulouse shooting.

Jewish-Americans in Canada Affected by IRS Tax Filing Enforcement Efforts

Lorne Shillinger, Partner, Tax, KPMG, Toronto

Jeffrey Brown, Partner, Tax, KPMG, Hamilton

Thousands of Jewish-Americans are among the roughly one million "United States persons" living in Canada who are subject to US income tax. US persons include US citizens, green card holders and even some "accidental Americans" who don't realize they are subject to US tax. Non-compliance with US tax laws among US persons in Canada remains widespread and has recently become subject to intense enforcement by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS).

Unlike most countries, the US subjects US persons to tax on their worldwide income wherever they reside and they are required to file annual US personal income tax returns even if no tax is due. A foreign tax credit often eliminates the US tax liability of US persons who pay tax in Canada but significant differences between US and Canadian tax laws can produce unexpected US tax.

> "The window of opportunity for US persons abroad to favourably correct past non-compliance is closing."

US persons are also required to file an annual information return called the Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts (FBAR) with the US Department of Treasury disclosing all foreign financial accounts if the aggregate value of the accounts exceeds US$10,000 at any time during a year. Foreign financial accounts include bank and investment accounts in which a US person has signature authority or a beneficial interest as well as Registered Retirement Savings Plans (RRSPs), Registered Education Savings Plans (RESPs) and Tax-Free Savings Accounts (TFSAs). Penalties for not filing FBARs can be as high as 50 percent of the total balance of the foreign accounts at the time of the violation. After 2010, a foreign account disclosure similar to and in addition to FBAR is a part of the US income tax return.

Other US tax reporting obligations exist for interests in Canadian mutual funds, non-US trusts, corporations, partnerships, RRSPs, RESPs and TFSAs.

Until a few years ago, US persons living in Canada could fix late US filing obligations with a "quiet disclosure" filing of up to six years worth of tax returns along with a reasonable cause statement requesting penalty abatement. The IRS rarely, if ever, denied such requests.

Two IRS amnesty programs, in 2009 and 2011, and a recently announced third one, attempted to facilitate wider voluntary compliance by delinquent US persons abroad with promises of reduced or no exposure to civil or criminal sanctions. With the IRS's historic "leniency" perceived to have ended with the 2011 amnesty program, a December 2011 IRS Fact Sheet reinforced longstanding IRS policy of encouraging voluntary disclosure by non-compliant US persons with reduced risk of civil or criminal penalties where no tax is due. The Fact Sheet further indicated that the IRS may grant penalty relief for late filers who owe tax but demonstrate reasonable cause. In addition, the Fact Sheet indicates that penalty relief may be available for some late FBAR filings.

The window of opportunity for US persons abroad to favourably correct past non-compliance is closing. Beginning in 2014, a US law called the Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act mandates that financial institutions outside of the US disclose to the IRS all accounts held by US persons.

KPMG can help US persons in Canada manage past non-compliance with US tax filings and remain compliant in the future. More than 200 of KPMG's US tax professionals, including many US-trained and licensed CPAs and attorneys, practice in Canada's largest Jewish communities including Toronto, North York, Hamilton, Ottawa, Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver.

Hockey instructor offers personalized service

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There are hands-on entrepreneurs and then there's Daniel Bochner, a business owner who's the manager, employee, strategic analyst and marketing maven for his own company.

Whether he prepares his own taxes is unclear, but when it comes to Universal Hockey, he is pretty much the company.

Only 27, Bochner has parlayed his skills on the ice, along with the experience he's accumulated playing in Canada and Europe, into a successful elite player development academy.

It's the go-to location for young players already competing in AAA, the highest level of hockey available in Canada. The instructor who joins them on the ice, prepares the drills and demonstrates the techniques is Bochner himself.

"I teach it, all the sessions," said Bochner. "Our skills are very difficult. It's a European training style."

"The way I set up my business is to offer a very elite product that people can't find elsewhere... People come because I'm the one teaching their kid. If I put X, Y, or Z on the ice, the people will feel cheated and won't come."

Bochner does have three people working for him, although not on the ice. One is Adam Reynolds, who runs a dry-land training program for the players. Another is Brenley Shapiro, a sports performance consultant who deals with the psychological issues faced by elite athletes. He's also hired a full-time administrator to handle the logistics and paperwork associated with the business.

Listen up: Daniel Bochner delivers on-ice instruction

"It's an all-encompassing development camp we run for kids," Bochner said.

Two years ago, when he started the business, he had one client who booked him to provide private lessons for his son. "Now I have students from more than seven countries," Bochner said.

The academy offers private and semi-private lessons, weekly camps and summer camps. The client list and the business have grown so quickly that Bochner has become a major customer for ice time at a couple of Toronto-area rinks. Most of his sessions are at the Pavilion and Chesswood Arena.

Daniel Bochner, centre, with a couple of his students

He admits he's spent almost nothing on advertising. News of the academy gets around by "word of mouth" and through Internet videos.

The business grew quickly. His first client, impressed with the results, offered to back him financially. He loaned Bochner enough money to book ice time in advance and purchase warm-up jackets and other accessories to make the company look more professional. Bochner proudly said he repaid the loan in only three months.

Today, the firm "is in the six figures in profit," Bochner said.

As an elite academy, Universal charges a premium for its services, about $100 to $150 more than at most other week-long camps. The hourly rate, which includes ice rental, is $220. Bochner is confident that despite the multitude of hockey camps and instructional assistance services that are out there, Universal is well worth the price.

Bochner employs some of the best techniques that he picked up in a lifetime of hockey. A product of the Toronto-area hockey organizations, he played for teams in Ajax and Thornhill, as well as the Mississauga Senators and the Lindsay Muskies.

Until fairly recently, he also played professionally in Finland, France and Serbia. In between, Bochner, whose father is from Haifa, joined the Israeli junior and senior national teams to play in IIHF Division II and III tournaments, winning two gold, two silver and two bronze medals.

When his competitive hockey career ended, "I still wanted to stay involved in hockey. I wanted to give back to the kids. A lot of people did a lot for me when I was a kid," he said.

Living in Europe, Bochner took note of the different techniques employed to teach youngsters individual skills. He believes Europeans are better at it than Canadians, who focus more on team-oriented concepts.

Europeans use a club system in which youngsters play as they grow up. That creates familiarity with players' skills and allows instructors more time to work with them. Canadian kids switch teams and coaches much more frequently. They simply don't work on individual skills as much as Europeans do, Bochner said.

Canada produces lots of talented hockey players, Bochner conceded, but consider that there are 550,000 people playing here, 40,000 in the GTA alone. In all of Sweden there are 65,000 players and in Russia, a country of 130 million, there are only 63,000 players. On a per capita basis, they do better at developing elite players, he said.

Bochner's on-ice sessions are based on "things I picked up along the way," in Europe and Canada.

Videos on his website show youngsters demonstrating skating agility and puck control that might intimidate lesser players. "Coaches here feel kids can't do these things," Bochner said, "so they don't teach it. I have a competitive advantage in that I can demonstrate the drills."

Videos of the drills carried on the Internet have attracted the attention of skaters around the world. Four kids from Austria enrolled in his camp after viewing the videos on YouTube.

The Internet has proven to be his main marketing tool, along with word of mouth.

Things are looking up for Universal. Bochner plans to expand by opening his own gym for off-ice training. And he expects to grow outside of Canada.

"I want us to become an international brand," he said. Next year he plans to open an academy in Sweden that will operate when Swedish kids are on holiday and Canadian kids are in school.

He plans to do the training himself. "I'm not concerned about the money. It's something I'm passionate about and giving people a fair product," he said.

Books examine Jews of Canada and Toronto

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

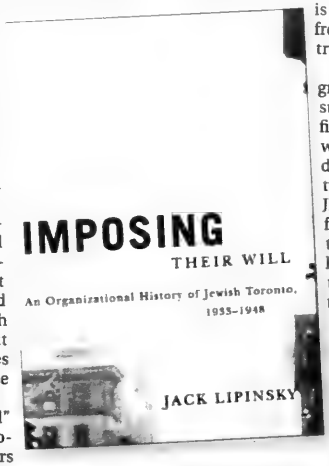
In Imposing Their Will: An Organizational History of Jewish Toronto, 1933-1948 (McGill-Queens), Toronto writer Jack Lipinsky presents an original and illuminating study of Toronto's Jewish community and convincingly demonstrates that the community underwent a crucial maturation in the 15-year period under discussion.

Community developed through series of clashes

Similarly, in The Defining Decade: Identity, Politics, and The Canadian Jewish Community in the 1960s (University of Toronto Press), Toronto academic Harold Troper, whose previous works include the renowned None Is Too Many, shows that the colourful '60s, now half a century distant, was a pivotal and transformative decade for Canadian Jews, a time when they found their place within wider Canadian society. Both books are welcome additions to our still understocked shelf of works addressing the history of the Jews in Canada and more specifically, Toronto.

Not since Stephen A. Speisman's classic 1979 book The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937, have we seen a work of scholarship on Toronto Jews as encompassing and insightful as Lipinsky's. Like Speisman, Lipinsky conducted much trailblazing archival research and interviewed previously neglected communal figures such as Dr. Martin Cohn, who spent his later years in Chicago. Also like Speisman, Lipinsky wrote the work initially as a PhD thesis – in his case rescuing it from an old computer disk and recalling it back to life after 18 years.

The thesis of Imposing Their Will is that Toronto's Jewish community developed through a series of clashes that pitted the old-fashioned "downtowner" Jews – with their shtetl mentality and religious notions about tzedakah – against a younger, more assimilated generation of "uptowners" with their professional ideas about how social work and charities should be managed to maximize efficiencies.



Only by "imposing their will" in a somewhat less than democratic fashion did the uptowners ultimately win this tug of war, bringing a semblance of organizational unity to the community. The book provides compelling back stories regarding the alphabet soup of Jewish social agencies and charities that often worked at cross-purposes to one another in the community's early days.

The Jewish Children's Home was a communal orphanage that was established on Simcoe Street about 1910 and was moved to a large house on Annette Street in the west Toronto Junction in 1922. The Maternal Aid Society ran the Home with funding from the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies (FJP), the Children's Aid Society and its own fund-raising campaigns. Dozens of dedicated volunteers faithfully visited and mentored the children.

But according to the FJP, the home suffered from a "narrowness of vision " and amateurish methods; also, its fund-raising campaign, in 1933, clashed with the FJP's own centralized campaign. Martin Cohn, whom Lipinsky fortuitously interviewed in 1985, was (in 1933) the FJP's executive director. A social-work professional and thus an uptowner, Cohn wrested control of the home from the downtowners and radically transformed how the community took care of its orphans – placing them in private homes rather than collectively under one institutional roof – in keeping with best professional practices.

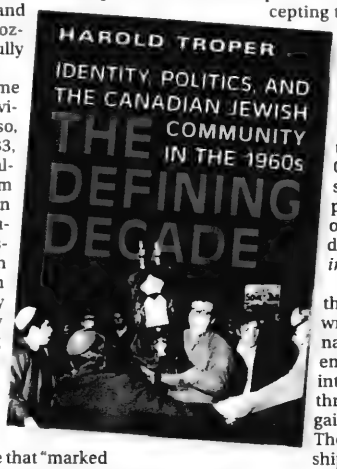
Cohn achieved the takeover by establishing a personnel committee that "marked a watershed in Toronto Jewish history," Lipinsky writes. "It signified the first acceptance of 'scientific charity' and its attendant beliefs in communal organization based on the theories of social work and communal planning."

Students of local Jewish history will appreciate such revealing glimpses into our communal institutions and the bitter battles that occurred behind the scenes. Although this is a bureaucratic history, it is one in which knives are drawn frequently: in other words, it is true to life.

The Toronto Jewish Immigrant Aid Society was the sole surviving local agency of the first Canadian Jewish Congress, which expired in organizational disarray soon after its premature birth in 1919. Regional JIAS offices were operating effectively in several cities across the country, but in Toronto the local JIAS was ineffective and the community turned instead to steamship ticket agents and other private influence peddlers for help on immigration-related issues.

Lipinsky has magnificently reconstructed this "lost" institutional history, which involved a protracted power struggle between JIAS's Toronto and Montreal offices. Ultimately, Montreal forced Toronto to "shed its narrow parochial vision" and revitalize itself.

He likewise turns his magnifying glass upon various other communal institutions including Congress, the Toronto Hebrew Free School and the United Jewish Welfare Fund (UJWF). Perhaps the period's most significant watershed moment occurred when the UJWF joined the citywide United Community Chest fund-raising campaign of 1943, thus accepting a role alongside the city's churches "as part of the larger civic society. By accepting the invitation, Toronto Jewry indicated that its interests were expanding beyond the parochialism of the prewar years."



Lipinsky thus pinpoints the beginning of the major transformations that brought Canada's Jews into the mainstream of Canadian society, a process that Troper (who was one of Lipinsky's mentors) describes so well in The Defining Decade.

The Defining Decade is a thoroughly researched, well-written account of the Canadian Jewish community's emergence from the shadows into daylight, propelled in part through a new self-confidence gained after the Six Day War. The author's obvious scholarship is embellished with incisive observations, telling statistics, crisp anecdotes and occasional splashes of humour. Both these books should appeal to readers who have a hearty interest in Canadian and/or Toronto Jewish history.

Bill Gladstone is the author, most recently, of A History of the Jewish Community of London Ontario. He gives frequent illustrated talks on the history of Toronto's Jewish community, a topic he also explores on his website, www.billgladstone.ca.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Comedian inspired by the great raconteurs

Marvin Glassman
Special To The CJN

Comedian Larry Miller, known for his funny anecdotes on late night talk shows, is bringing his one-man show Cocktails With Larry Miller: Marriage, Children and Drinking and How One Leads to Another to the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts on March 29.

"There is a connection with drinking that leads to all that happens in your life," Miller, 58, said from his home in Los Angeles. "You celebrate life by drinking, you cope with problems with drinking and so marriage and children can lead you to drinking a lot more than you think."

While his name sounds common,his comedy is not. Miller uses his ability to observe funny incidents that happen in everyday life and, instead of reciting funny punch lines, builds a story about the incident to make the situation even more humorous.

Born in Valley Stream, N.Y., Miller grew up admiring the famed Jewish comedians who were great raconteurs, such as Myron Cohen and Alan King.

"They used words to great comic effect and being Jewish made it easy to be a comedian. Judaism is a religion that is about using words wisely, with many inflections. The Torah is all about story telling, so it is natural for me to tell funny stories on my observations of life."

Miller has also created memorable characters in the 100 films and television appearances in his career. Miller played the obnoxious doorman in the television series Seinfeld and the social climbing Arnie Stein in the 2006 film Keeping Up With The Steins. On occasion, Miller has also played dramatic roles such as a wife killer on Law & Order.

"Even though I am known for comedy, I relished having a dramatic role and the wife killer turned out to be one of the most viewed episodes of Law & Order."

In 2006 Miller published some of his funny observations in the bestselling Spoiled Rotten America: Outrages From Everyday Life and shares some of these stories on stage. He will also perform beloved routines, such as Five Stages Of Drinking, his parody of the famed song These Are A Few Of My Favorite Things, and playing Moses bickering with God about the Ten Commandments. Miller, who is married to television writer Eileen Conn and has two children will also tell anecdotes about his family.

Larry Miller

Off the stage, Miller has shared some political commentary in a serious manner, such as his view that there is no country called Palestine, as he wrote in a 2000 column in The Weekly Standard.

"I strongly feel what I wrote back then is still true and nothing has changed to make me feel different. The Jewish people have achieved so much and all the Palestinians want is to destroy everything we accomplished," said Miller.

Unlike Jackie Mason who expresses his political comments on stage, Miller does not want his commentary to interfere with comedy.

"When I go on stage, I am having a good time and I want to take the audience along with me. The political comments are part of whom I am, but not when I am with an audience."

Israeli jazz trio pays visit to Canada

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Emerging Israeli jazz ensemble, the Ofir Shwartz Trio, gave their first concerts in Canada earlier this month.

Playing two shows, a March 8 warm-up gig at the University of Toronto, followed by a March 9 full performance at Edmonton's YardBird Suite jazz club as part of its international jazz concert series, the trio was excited to finally make it to Canada.

Speaking to The CJN before the Toronto appearance, Ofir Shwartz said he was already looking forward to returning for city's 2013 jazz festival.

"We have good plans for returning, and we've been in touch with the Toronto Jazz Festival [organizers]," Shwartz said.

The trio's jazz style is upbeat, unorthodox and extremely engaging.

Shwartz, who plays piano and is the principal composer, is accompanied by Simon Starr on double bass and Roy Oliel on drums.

They've been receiving critical acclaim since releasing their first CD, 2010's Earlier in Time, which the trio has been supporting via world tours much of the last two years. A new album is in the works, and Shwartz said he anticipates finishing it in Israel this year.

The trio's style is unique, likely because Shwartz, 32, learned to play jazz by ear. As such, his style and vision of the music comes from an intuitive source rather than any formal training.

"I didn't go to university to study it or anything like that. I got into jazz in high school through a friend. I was immediately fascinated by the sounds, the harmonies. I've been into music since I was two years old... and there was something in [jazz] music that was nowhere else," he said.

Shwartz said he is influenced by fellow Israeli jazz musicians as well as internationally renowned players Chick Corea, Brad Mehldau and Keith Jarrett, among others. Canadian jazz piano legend Oscar Peterson is also one of his influences.

Asked how he feels being a jazz ambassador for Israel, Shwartz said it's a "fascinating" experience.

"Everywhere I go, we get lots of love from the crowd. And I like to represent Israel in a different way. It's not like [Israel] is represented in the news. It's a cultural experience that the crowds love, and I love to do it."

He added: "Not many people know about Israeli jazz, and when they hear it, they're just astonished. But there are many amazing Israeli jazz players who are in the top [tier] of the jazz ranks worldwide."

The search for heirloom turns into quest for roots

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Pearl Gluck's obsesssive search for a family heirloom – a well-worn 19th-century Turkish-style couch known as a divan – turns into a quest for roots and a deeply felt rumination on family and faith in her 90-minute debut documentary, Divan.

It is scheduled to be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre's Al Green Theatre on March 25 at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m.

A feisty and inquisitive woman, Gluck was born in Borough Park, a New York City chassidic enclave she describes as "a whole Yiddish country" nestled in the folds of Brooklyn.

Raised as a strict Orthodox Jew, she assumed she would marry a Torah scholar and have 10 children. But this was not to be. When Gluck was 10, her parents divorced, and she and her mother left Borough Park for good.

Gluck attended a liberal Jewish school and broke with chassidic Judaism. Torn between her past and present, she became something of an outcast in her former community.

Nonetheless, Gluck retained nostalgic feelings about Borough Park and remembered the stories she had heard about her great-great-grandfather's legendary divan in Hungary and the rebbes who had slept on it.

Long estranged from her conservative father, who disapproved of her secular lifestyle, profession as a filmmaker and single status, Gluck decided to retrieve the divan to please him.

The journey that takes her to Rohod, a town in northeastern Hungary where her ancestors lived, comprises the bulk of the film. She meets a distant cousin – a Holocaust survivor in a country where more than 400,000 Jews were murdered in 1944 – and visits a Jewish cemetery.

Travelling farther afield, she ventures into a part of Ukraine that was torn from Hungary's grasp and encounters the remnants of old Jewish communities and connects with her family's history.

She finds the elusive couch – a grand piece of period furniture upholstered in a gold and burgundy pattern – but cannot buy it. To her delight, she stumbles upon a suitable substitute in a flea market and has it shipped to the United States.

As she suggests, her father would have been far more satisfied had she brought back a suitable husband. Dad, however, appreciates his daughter's gesture, and reconciliation is now possible.

Gluck weaves the sub-stories of alienated chassidic Jews into the fabric of Divan, and their revealing comments add nuance and spirit to what is sometimes a meandering and disjointed film.

French films portray the two faces of Islam

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Two radically different sides of Islam are depicted in two French films due to be screened at the 15th annual Cinefranco festival, which runs this year from March 23 to April 1 at the TIFF Bell Lightbox (350 King St. W).

Free Men (March 25 at 6:30 p.m.), set in Nazi-occupied Paris in 1942, focuses on the imam of a mosque who takes it upon himself to help Jews facing deportation.

The Disintegration (March 28 at 9 p.m.) unfolds in present-day Lille and is a disturbing account of a Muslim extremist who converts a group of young men to his radical creed.

Although fictional, Free Men, directed by Ismael Ferroukhi, is inspired by real events.

Younes (Tahar Rahim), a young, Algerian-born black marketer who survives by his wits, is arrested by the Vichy police and forced to become an informer. The mosque is doling out fake identity certificates to Jews and resistance fighters, but who are the recipients? Younes' task is to find the answer.

As he loiters on the grounds of the mosque, a serene sanctuary in a bustling city, he meets the imam, a reflective man named Ben Ghabrit (Michael Lonsdale), and befriends an Algerian cabaret singer, Salim (Mahmoud Shalaby).

At first Younes is merely a self-interested hustler who has emotionally distanced himself from the Nazi occupation. The profit motive is his only concern. But as he draws closer to the imam and Salim, who holds one of the imam's certificates, he becomes fully engaged in the struggle against fascism and a member of the French resistance movement.

Free Men, which unfolds against the backdrop of Nazi roundups of Jews, is propelled forward by frenetic bursts of intrigue and suspense. But there are also somnolent moments when the film sputters and loses momentum.

The cast is competent, lending plausibility to an inspiring footnote in wartime Paris in which a decent imam emerges as a quiet hero. The Disintegration, directed by Philippe Faucon and featuring a nearly all-Arab cast, delves into the nether world of partially assimilated North African Arabs who turn to Islamic fundamentalism for succor after being rejected by mainstream French society.

Ali, a forklift operator who lives with his mother and sister in a drab apartment building in a bleak suburb, is mystified why he cannot find a white-collar internship that may brighten his otherwise dim prospects.

Honeycomb Way offers up Jewish musical fusion

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When two masters of radically different Jewish musical styles join together in performance next week, the outcome is apt to be aurally astounding.

Frank London, leader and trumpeter of the popular klezmer band The Klezmatics, and Yair Dalal, renowned Israeli oud player and Middle Eastern Jewish music aficionado, are currently composing songs that will blend their respective musical genres and then perform the pieces at a March 28, 8 p.m. concert at the Jane Mallett Theatre in Toronto's St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts.

The concert is titled The Honeycomb Way: A Musical Journey into the Sacred.

The two musicians are in town this week conducting master classes at the Koffler Centre with local players as well as working in a weeklong residency together with a who's who of popular Toronto-based Jewish and multi-ethnic musicians who will accompany them on stage next Wednesday night for the performance.

Scheduled to perform with Dalal and London on stage next week are Sudanese multi-instrumentalist Waleed Abdulhamid; Aviva Chernick, lead singer of Jaffa Road; percussionist Rick Shadrach Lazar; Prague-born Yiddish singer Lenka Lichtenberg; Greek outi and bouzouki player Demetrios Petsalakis; South Asian drummer Debashis Sinha and Egyptian-Canadian songstress Maryem Tollar.

Frank London

Reached in California by phone last week, Dalal told The CJN he was looking forward to working with London and the other musicians on this musical venture.

He said juxtaposing his beloved Jewish Iraqi musical influences with the Ashkenazi eastern European genre is not without its challenges. However, he said the two styles do share some similar scales and common Jewish melodies, and themes that he believes will render something beautiful for both the listener and the players.

"There's a lot of opportunity to find common ground between the two [musical] traditions. Because the source of the music is common between the two," Dalal said. "We both have songs from the Kabbalah, the Psalms, from Shabbat and other holidays. The words are the same. It's just the melodies that changed."

Dalal said before arriving in Toronto, he and London had already started experimenting musically together and that at times the initial sonic experience sounded odd to him.

"It felt a little bit strange. But it felt like I was making peace between the Jews," he quipped. "There is the chassidic, klezmer, Babylonian and Moroccan [musical] traditions... and they don't come together often. When people around the world think about Jewish music, they think about klezmer and don't know about Middle Eastern Jewish music, which there is a lot of."

He said The Honeycomb Way concert provides a unique opportunity for the world to find out more about this rich side of Jewish musical equation.

Dalal said he's also excited to work with Lichtenberg, as the two are currently putting together an album called Lullaby in Exile, which will feature lullabies from both the Yiddish and Iraqi Jewish traditions.

"We've already recorded three songs. It's a very exciting project," he said.

A chilling picture

Djamel, an older man with a calm and charismatic demeanour, claims the French are racist and won't give Arabs like Ali a fair chance to improve themselves.

Context is important. Before Ali comes under Djamel's influence, he beats up a "Frenchie" for having called an Arab boy a "dirty Arab."

Racism is a rampant reality in Lille, and Ali is affected by it. The cultural and religious gulf between Arabs and "Frenchies" is not only wide but also deep.

Having decided he will longer tolerate treatment as a second-class citizen, Ali is eager to listen to Djamel's incendiary philosophy of jihad. So are his friends, one of whom is a zealous French convert to Islam.

Djamel defames "infidels," denounces Israel and praises Muslim fighters in Afghanistan. Ali buys Djamel's propaganda line and becomes a pious Muslim, but Ali's brother – a secular person who has a Christian girlfriend and seeks assimilation – accuses Djamel of mixing fact with fiction.

Rejecting his brother's critique, Ali plunges deeper into Djamel's dark universe and joins a plot to bomb a NATO base in Belgium.

Ably directed and cast, The Disintegration paints a chilling and convincing picture of young Arab men whose minds are twisted in the service of a grotesque ideology.

Orthodox hoops team reaches Texas finals

Uri Fintzy
JTA

FORT WORTH, Texas — In Texas, they say, high school athletics are a religion. But the saying took on a new meaning earlier this month.

The Robert M. Beren Academy, a small modern Orthodox school in Houston, captured national headlines during the week. Its boys basketball team earned a berth in the state tournament 2A semifinals, but would have been forced to forfeit because the games coincided with Shabbat.

An 11th-hour legal challenge convinced the tournament organizer, the Texas Association of Private and Parochial Schools, or TAPPS, to accommodate the team. And on Friday, March 2, hours before the Sabbath was to begin, Nolan Catholic High School was the place to be for Houston Jews who had made the four-hour trip to cheer on their boys.

Beren reached the finals on Saturday night but lost, 46-42, to Abilene Christian High School. But even after coming up short, the game's larger significance didn't appear lost on the players. For an hour after the final whistle, fans, friends and family lingered in the gym to support the players.

"I am proud to be here," said Beren guard Isaac Mirwis. "It's more than just basketball. It's about being true to who you are."

That would seem to be the lesson of the whole episode, which saw a little-known Jewish school in Texas cast into the national spotlight for standing firm on its refusal to violate its religious principles for the sake of a basketball game. After a refusal by TAPPS to accede to Beren's request to reschedule the games, the New York Times, ESPN and other national news outlets picked up the story, which was also much discussed on social networks.

After a second request to TAPPS was denied, it looked like Beren was going to have to forfeit. Playing on Shabbat was never considered.

"Our priorities were never shaky," said coach Chris Cole, who is not Jewish but has coached the Beren team for 10 years. "I learned very quickly that there is no compromise as far as upholding the religious faith."

On the morning of March 1, several Beren players and parents filed a civil rights motion in federal court accusing TAPPS of religious discrimination and asking for a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction. Before a judge had time to rule on the matter, TAPPS acquiesced and said it would reschedule the games.

"The experience gave us the opportunity to show how much we care about religion," said senior Isaac Buchine. "The way you make something special is to sacrifice something that is much greater for it."

With the scheduling victory, it was time for basketball, and the atmosphere in the Nolan Catholic gym was electric for the Friday afternoon semifinal game. Beren students who had been allowed to leave school early, families with kids, elderly couples, local basketball fans and rabbis crowded the bleachers. One young fan held a sign that read, "Be a mensch."

Beren also got some support from an unexpected source – members of the Burton Adventist Academy soccer team showed up to cheer them on. Burton had its own beef with TAPPS a few years before over a Saturday soccer game that TAPPS had declined to reschedule.

"The doors were blown wide off," said Kevin Klein, the Burton coach, of Beren's earning the right to compete. "Sabbath keepers across Texas don't have to fear not being able to play."

Dallas Covenant proved little challenge in the semifinals for the Stars. Led by junior Zach Yoshor, the Stars breezed to a 58-46 victory and a spot in the Saturday-night final.

"We kind of blocked everything out and focused on playing basketball," Yoshor said.

After the game, the Stars returned to their hotel to prepare for the final and observe the Sabbath, with special services hosted by the Dallas Jewish community. The next night, with the game set for 8 p.m., not long after Shabbat ended, the team didn't arrive until only minutes before tipoff.

In the locker room, Cole tried to fire up his players.

"Now there are no regrets," he told them. "You are representing your school, your family and your faith. Make everybody proud."

After a short prayer, the game began. It was a sloppy one for the Stars, with turnovers and easy shots missed. Beren seemed unable to cope with Abilene's defence.

Despite trailing through much of the first half, Beren managed to forge a 19-19 tie shortly before halftime. But a quick rally to start the second half pushed Abilene ahead for good. After the game the Beren players were left in tears, but they had inspired a community.

Robert Beren, the school's namesake, recognized the point wasn't the outcome of a basketball game.

"Win or lose," Beren said, "this whole experience was a victory for everyone."

Tweeting aboard the Queen streetcar

Participants will be able to ride the 501 streetcar and interact with their mobile phones.

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

One performance sure to be on track at the theatre festival Free Fall '12: Performance Without a Net is Route 501 Revisited.

Participants are invited to hop aboard Toronto's 501 Queen streetcar, from Neville Park to Long Branch, for a guided tour, discussion and tweeting conducted by Toronto journalist Jonathan Goldsbie. The tweeting will revolve around the goings-on both in and outside of the streetcar.

Goldsbie, a journalist specializing in Toronto City Hall and municipal affairs, writes in the National Post and appears on TV station CP24 every Monday, although he's best known for his Twitter feed, where he breaks local news and gossip, and shares live tweets from political meetings and events.

Free Fall '12, presented by the Theatre Centre, features groundbreaking performance art by emerging and established artists from across Canada. The festival is co-curated by the Theatre Centre's artistic director Franco Boni and Praxis Theatre's Michael Wheeler.

"I got to know Michael Wheeler through activism, politics and through working at the Fringe Festival," says Goldsbie. "He and Franco Boni had been looking at what some performance arts companies in the States had done, in terms of using Twitter as a medium for performance arts, as a way to having it as the primary venue for a larger conceptual performance project. So, they approached me to come up with something using Twitter."

Jonathan Goldsbie

Having never been offered a budget for a project before, Goldsbie jumped at the chance to charter a streetcar, an idea he had had for a while. He was fascinated by the image you get when you sit [in the] centre back seat of a streetcar and get a perfect symmetrical view simultaneously of the outside and the inside.

"When Michael and Franco explained to me that their broad curatorial vision of the festival was around the topics of the interplay between private space and public space, I had this idea for a Twitter-based streetcar tour," says Goldsbie. "Inside no one would be actually interacting, just on their phones – commenting on the world outside in this digital, online, virtual realm.

"On one level, it is sort of a funny parody of the average commute anyway, in which people are crammed together in a public space, but very few people are interacting. They are all buried in their phones."

Goldsbie wants people to come away from the experience entertained as well as enlightened about the environment of Queen Street. He thinks the concept is strong, weird and funny enough, and hopes to be pleasantly surprised by the participants' reactions.

He is leading the event twice. On March 27, at 7 p.m., participants are invited to board a chartered streetcar at Neville Park, and then on March 31, at 1 p.m., participants will board at Neville Park, on a public ride.

For more information about Free Fall '12, including Route 501 Revisited, call 416-538-0988 or visit online at www.freefall12.eventbrite.ca and/or www.theatrecentre.org. Goldsbie can be followed on Twitter at @ Goldsbie.

NEW SOFTWARE FOR KIDS WITH AUTISM SPECTRUM DISORDER

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Sara Winter has been an aide for children with autism spectrum disorder (ASD) at home and at school, including her own 11-year-old nephew, for over a decade.

A professional dancer, Winter had sustained a knee injury and was recovering from surgery shortly after her nephew was diagnosed. He needed a therapist, and working with him "was mostly a practical decision at first, but what happened was that I got to be with [my nephew] every day and see him navigate his life."

Winter, who worked as her nephew's educational assistant while he was a student at the Toronto Heschel School, said another perk to working with him was being able to experience a Jewish education, second-hand.

"I didn't attend day school... It was a gift to be able to explore Judaism through the kids I was in class with, and a very meaningful experience," she said.

Winter added that although her efforts were meant to help her nephew, she also benefited from and was inspired by his strength.

"I had no idea how much one little boy would change the way I looked at everything," said the 38-year-old Winnipeg native.

After a skirmish one day at recess that left her nephew upset, Winter encouraged him to type a note to his parents on her Blackberry to convey his feelings.

"I was completely astounded by the level of sophistication he was showing by expressing himself in this way. I realized in that moment that I had been underestimating him, and if I was underestimating him, who else in his immediate community was, and what opportunities was he missing out on as a result?"

As diverse as the challenges are that can accompany a diagnosis of ASD, Winter said she thinks the biggest challenge is that "these kids are often misunderstood because they communicate differently. Many environments are not conducive to receiving the information they're putting out."

It was then that Winter, who has been trained in the use of several therapies, realized there should be software for kids with autism "that isn't therapy and isn't gaming, but something in between. Something that took [her nephew's] communication style and sensory processing into consideration and made it safe for him to communicate not only with parents and peers, but with himself."

Sara Winter

She spoke to her family and "in a leap of faith," decided to create Squag – an innovative social platform designed specifically for tweens and teens (ages eight to 18) with autism.

The service, which includes a desktop application and a website, offers these children a safe and comfortable online space where they can practise their communication skills and gain self-confidence.

Winter said Squag was designed to build "organic relationships" driven by the kids and supported by their parents. As a social, recreational and creative outlet for these children, Squag gives users a chance to self-reflect before reaching out to their peers.

"We built this platform based on our loved one," Winter said. Squag was one of her nephew's first words (his word for "square" back in the early days of his diagnosis and treatment therapy).

"The word reminds us how far he's come and how far we know he'll go."

Once a parent registers and is approved to be part of the Squag community, their first task is to set up their child's Squagpad, Winter said.

"They curate content and post positive messages for their son or daughter to see when they arrive in their room. The Squagpad is a beautiful private space, with no file sharing of any kind."

When the users arrive in their Squagpad, they are surrounded by all of their favourite things. They can watch videos, browse photos and write in their journal. They can scroll over their room, see notes from their parents and brainstorm their own ideas to share with their peers, Winter said.

Still in its early stages, Squagpad is now in a testing phase before its wider launch this spring. Through a matching system monitored by parents, users are offered a small sample of Squaggers to connect with. If the other user accepts, their Squagpads pop up together and the original thoughts they've created about themselves become available to spark conversation.

"Squagging is always one on one, based on matching criteria set up by the user's parents. Users have an opportunity to reach out to their peers based on common interests and shared experiences. Squag offers kids on the autism spectrum a safe corner of the web, where they can self-reflect, break down the big idea of friendship and build confidence to take with them where ever they go."

Winter said one of the reasons she thinks kids with autism are often misunderstood is that they have trouble adjusting emotionally in their home or school environment.

"When kids are regulated, and out of fright/flight mode, they are available to learn and therefore connect. That's what we're out to do. To give them a place that's safe in every way, offering a little bit of extra time to respond and create original ideas."

Almost 300 families from 12 different countries are now testing Squag, Winter said.

Many of the children have given feedback on how the features work, and she is paying close attention to their input.

"The goal is to give them an opportunity to ask for what they need and want to see down the road. Some of the older teens do not like all the parent involvement, which is something to consider for this specific group of users only."

She said the children "really want to connect with other Squaggers. They want to be able to talk about their unique interests that aren't necessarily validated in their daily lives."

Creating a Squagpad can be done through a free trial offer, but there is a monthly fee of $7.99 to maintain the account. For more information, please go to www.squag.com.

Winter said she plans to donate 10 per cent of Squag's proceeds to special needs organizations.

As one of the first Certified B corporations in Canada – those that use business to solve social and environmental problems – Squag meets higher standards of social and environmental performance, transparency and accountability, Winter said.

"משהו עצוב מאוד התגלה לי בסוף השבוע שעבר. כשהיינו במלון". פותחת טלי. כשאנחנו מתיישבות לקפה השבועי. "הסתכלת במראות של המעליות? זו התאורה, ממי, את לא כל כך מקומטת". אני מנחמת. טלי: איזה מראות? לא, אני מדברת על משהו אחר. אני: עמדת רק עם חזייה ותחתונים והסתכלת במראה של האמבטיה? זו התאורה החולנית של האמבטיות בבתי המלון. את לא שמנה. טלי: תגידי, מה עובר עליך? אין לי בעייה עם איך שאני נראית. אני נראית טוב מאוד! אולי לא מאוד. אולי לא טוב...אבל עזבי, זה לא העניין. או שכן? (בוחנת אותי במתח). נו, אז את לא מתכוונת לשאול אותי כבר משהו?

אני: סליחה, חומד. מה קרה לך? ולשאלתך-לא. אני לא חרשבת שהם מתאימים.

טלי (נאנחת): גילית שבן זוגי היקר בשום אופן לא מסוגל להיות רומנטי. הוא כבר לא עושה לי את זה, וחמור מזה: אני, כניראה, כבר לא עושה לו את זה.

אני: את צריכה להתרגל לזה שהוא גונב מגבות. תביני אותו - הן שם, יבחינם.

טלי: בארוחת ערב הוא בחר את היין הכי זול. וככה הוא גם אמר למלצר- תביא את היין הכי זול שלכם. את יודעת איך התביישתי מהמלצר? ובמעלית הוא הסתכל על איזו קנדית יפה, וקרץ לי. קרץ לי! מה. אני חבר שלו מהמילואים?!

אני: אידיוט! אנחנו אשמות שהקנדיות כאלה יפות? ועוד בתאורה של מעלית!

טלי: זה לא הפוינט, נינה. ואחרי המקלחת אמרתי לו בוא נראה הערב ביחד את השקיעה? ומה הוא אומר? עזבי, נחכה שזה ייצא בדי.וי.די. את קולטת?!

אני: ככה לא מתנהגים אליך! חוצפן עלוב. את צריכה לעזוב אותו מייד!

טלי (בוחנת אותי): מה לעזוב אותו?

אני: מה עוד הוא עשה, הפסיכי? בטח לא קנה לך אפילו פרח מהאלה שמסתובבים בין השולחנות, ומציעים לגברים לקנות ורד לאהובתן היקרה.

טלי: הוא לא פסיכי! הוא לא קנה לי פרח, כי הוא יודע שאני אלרגית לפרחים. הוא מכיר אותי. הוא יודע שאני אוהבת מגבות גבוהות וגם נייר טואלט ולפעמים מאפרות, ושאני שונאת לבזבז סתם על יין. וזה שהוא קרץ לי, אומר שאנחנו באדיר, שהוא סומך עלי. הוא משוגע עלי. פשוט קשה לו להראות, זה הכל.

אני: אז זה מה שאני אומרת, הוא אוהב אותך, תשמחי!

טלי (בחיוך): את צודקת בכל מילה. הוא באמת אוהב אותי, הטמבל. שנזמין?

The CJN's Hebrew-language columnist, Yosef Tastassa, discusses whether withdrawal from the territories can bring peace.

The common experience of mass atrocity suffered by the Jewish, Rwandan, Cambodian and other communities living in Montreal is the subject of a yearlong exhibition at the Centre d'histoire de Montréal in Old Montreal.

After almost 60 years, Jews are gathering once again at the former Chevra Kadisha synagogue and community life is being revived with the influx of mostly younger people to the area. What's the big deal about hair?

Hair is neither inconspicuous nor insignificant. What other body part encourages such wonderment, gossip and instruction?

Actor Jennifer Aniston's various Hollywood hairstyles have been copied by many women, and long-haired singer Willie Nelson inspired seniors to grow their hair out. I once met a Breslever Chassid who had the traditional haredi buzz cut, but his payot (side curls) were coiffed and deliberately stylized – jet black and cylindrically curly like a tornado. Their hair speaks to us.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Hair is a big deal in the Orthodox world. There are many halachot (Jewish laws) surrounding it, such as how much hair is considered a barrier between you and your tfillin. There's also a tradition that requires a male child to wait until he's three years old before having his locks cut, while Jewish women are commanded to cover their hair, and some even shave it off.

According to Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch's (1808-1888) commentary on the Torah, our mouth and eyes represent the physical parts of our body, while our foreheads embody the intellectual.

Rabbi Hirsch states that the physical requires special supervision, so that we don't "slide into a pattern of self-destruction," and therein lies the significance of hair. It's a point we need to focus on in order to ensure that hair is used for good. This great sage teaches us that hair is about sensuality control, therefore a woman must wear a head covering. Men have payot (which separate the sensual part of the brain from the intellectual), and young boys have their first haircut at three as a way of instructing them to use their intelligence to control their deeds.

After reading Rabbi Hirsch's explanation, it begins to make sense why people seem to take great interest, and sometimes offence, in the length of other folks' hair.

Throughout my life, I've been approached by people young and old asking me why my hair is so long. "Why don't you get a haircut?" Nowadays, they ask the same about my son, Noah River.

(Since I was a child, having long hair meant a lot to me. I'm not sure why, but after getting haircuts, I would be petrified to return to school, fearing such epithets as, "Rosensweig, did you bump into a lawnmower?" Unfortunately, later on, having short hair was just as important to my father and the rabbis in my yeshiva as my long hair was to me.)

I tell hair-curious people that Noah and I love long hair, but they're rarely satisfied. A Jewish community leader once told me that I'd do better in life with shorter hair. I responded that I had just received a promotion. He rebutted, "You would do even better." I smiled at him. I had little to say. In his mind, my sensuality control was dialed too high, and it made him feel out of control.

I don't know what it's like to be bald. I understand that it can be very traumatic. I do know, however, the tribulations of having a thick mane of hair that symbolizes for many a lack of conformity, and perhaps even a lascivious nature.

While I understand the mystical view put forward by Rabbi Hirsch, it might serve us better to pay less attention to the crown of hair atop a person's head and more to the body that's carrying it and the soul that lies within it.

After all, do we really know what lurks in the nature of the finely cut?

Israel, Diaspora: ties that bind

Poll shows high level of concern for fellow Jews

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Israel is known as the home of the Jewish People, but to what extent do Israelis concern themselves about Jews living outside their country?

Quite a bit, as it turns out.

A recent poll of 500 Israelis commissioned by the Jewish Agency found high levels of concern for Diaspora Jewry, with 76 reporting that they believe Israelis and Diaspora Jews are mutually responsible for each other.

The poll, conducted by the Dahaf Institute, also found that 91 per cent of Israelis believe the country should assist Jewish communities during crises, and 81 per cent believe Jews in Israel and abroad feel they are all part of a single people. Eighty-nine per cent agree that the relationship between Jews in Israel and the Diaspora contributes to the Jewish People's continued existence.

The findings vindicate the view that "Israelis are part of the Jewish world and that Israel is the state of the Jewish People," said Shoel Silver, a member of the Jewish Agency for Israel's executive and chair of its budget and finance committee. "It endorses the view we had that the Jewish Agency tries to be the bridge between the Diaspora and Israel that goes in both directions."

New NDP leader strongly backs Israel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Not only is Thomas Mulcair the new leader of the official Opposition, he's a strong backer of Israel and has many ties to the Jewish community.

The New Democrat MP for Outremont won the party's leadership race last Saturday.

Mulcair, 57, is familiar with the Jewish community, having served as Liberal MNA for the multicultural Montreal-area riding of Chomedey from 1994 to 2007 and as New Democrat MP for Outremont since the 2007 federal election.

Thomas Mulcair

In April 2008, Mulcair addressed a Montreal audience at a gala event hosted by Tribune Juive magazine – a French-language publication whose aim is to educate Quebecers about Jewish and Israeli culture – telling the crowd in French that he will always be a supporter of Israel for numerous reasons.

"My wife, Catherine Pinhas, who was born in France and whose family is of Turkish origin, is a descendant of the Sephardim who were expelled from Spain in 1492," Mulcair told the audience.

"When we here think of 1492, we think of Christopher Columbus and his arrival in America. But for Sephardi Jews, 1492 evokes their expulsion from Spain by the Catholic monarchs. One of the most gracious gestures I have ever seen in politics took place in 1992, when King Juan Carlos I of Spain went to a Madrid synagogue to ask for pardon."

He added: "My in-laws are Holocaust survivors. Their history is part of my daily life.

CANADA

Deportation Fought

TORONTO — A Muslim lesbian couple who fear relatives will kill them if they're deported to their native Israel will get another refugee hearing, a Federal Court of Canada judge ruled. Iman Musa and Majida Mugrabi arrived in Canada in 2007 and had subsequent refugee claims rebuffed. They appealed, and were granted a new hearing based on new evidence that one of Mugrabi's cousins murdered his sister in a 2000 "honour killing," the Toronto Sun reported.

WORLD

Swastikas Found

BUFFALO — Swastikas directed against Jewish students were found at two U.S. universities. A swastika and an antisemitic epithet were scratched into the door of the campus Hillel at the University of Buffalo. The attack occurred earlier this month when students were away for spring break. Meanwhile, swastikas were scratched into two cars, and tires were slashed on two other cars, belonging to members of the historically Jewish Zeta Beta Tau fraternity at Washington University in St. Louis. The attack occurred March 15 or 16 and was discovered when students returned from spring break. A female acquaintance of one of the fraternity members confessed to the vandalism.

U.S. Burial Expected

MUNICH — Convicted Nazi war criminal John Demjanjuk will be buried near his home in Cleveland. The U.S. Consulate in Munich confirmed his body will be returned to his family. Jewish leaders are concerned his grave could become a neo-Nazi shrine. Demjanjuk, 91, died March 17 in a German old-age home, where he was free while appealing his May 2011 conviction for his role in the murder of 27,900 people at the Sobibor death camp. The Ukraine-born retired autoworker immigrated to the United States after World War II. In 1986, he was tried in Israel on charges of being the notorious Treblinka guard "Ivan the Terrible." He was sentenced to death, but Israel's Supreme Court released him due to reasonable doubt that he was Ivan while noting strong evidence emerged at trial that he'd been a Sobibor guard.

'Red Ken' At It Again

LONDON — Ken Livingstone, the former mayor of London seeking to reclaim his post, used language that was nearly "classic antisemitism" in a meeting with the city's Jewish leaders, the leaders said. Livingstone, of the Labour party, said Jews would not vote for him because "the Jewish community is rich," according to a letter about the March 1 meeting from the leaders to party leader Ed Miliband, obtained by the Jewish Chronicle. Livingstone met with the Jewish leaders to discuss his accepting money from Iranian state broadcaster Press TV and his support of a radical Muslim cleric.

Another Delay in Diab Extradition Case

Hassan Diab

OTTAWA — Justice Minister Rob Nicholson didn't give reasons why he has delayed for a second time a decision on whether to extradite a former University of Ottawa sociology professor in connection with a deadly 1980 Paris shul bombing.

Hassan Diab was committed for extradition to France last summer, and Nicholson was due to make a decision in the case by late February, but Diab's lawyer said then that the minister had asked for another month because of "new material and new assessment of the French case," the Ottawa Citizen reported.

Diab, 57, was arrested in Ottawa in 2008. The case hinges on controversial handwriting evidence linking him to the crime. The judge said it was enough to warrant extradition, but added the French case would likely be too weak to convict him in a Canadian trial.

Diab's lawyer will likely take the case to the Federal Court of Appeal if Nicholson rules against him.

Schools review security after Toulouse attack

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Local Jewish day schools have tightened security measures in the wake of the murders at the Ozar Hatorah day school in Toulouse, France, earlier this month.

Bialik's head of school Shana Harris said the school has reviewed its security protocols with all staff and beefed up security details.

"We have hired additional security, and informed parents of what we are doing," she said. The school has also sent a letter of condolence to Ozar Hatorah.

The Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School has also gone over its security protocols and increased vigilance among staff.

Principal Rhonda Rosenheck said her school's security is handled by the Miles Nadal JCC, where the downtown school is housed, but upon hearing of the shootings in France, she spoke with the security staff and the centre's executive director "for assurance that they were on heightened alert."

"They were and are. They had [also] received direction from the UJA Federation security advisory group. Our office personnel also have been keeping a sharpened eye at the school entrance area, which is well inside the JCC," she said.

In an e-mail sent to parents March 21, Associated Hebrew Day Schools executive director Elliott Brodkin said Associated decided to also follow advice it received from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and "not hire extra security guards for each of our buildings."

He said CIJA and the federation indicated that the Toronto Jewish community "was not under any heightened or imminent threat."

However, Brodkin wrote that his school has elevated "the frequency and visibility" of its staff's external patrols and supervision, and that both the York Regional Police and the Toronto Police have agreed to "make additional visits and patrols to all our branches for the foreseeable future."

CIJA confirmed the community was briefed on security issues last week.

CEO Shimon Fogel said his organization had already been in ongoing contact with schools and institutions about such matters even before the tragic events in Toulouse.

We are an Orthodox family, so when our father died, it was important to have a service that strictly observed Jewish law. We chose Benjamin's because of their superior care. They helped us fulfil every sacred rite, from Shmira to Shiva. Our father was never left alone, and neither were we. Thank you Benjamin's for keeping the light alive.

Two new Haggadot

From the editor's desk...

It is my custom at this time of year to bring to readers' attention new Pesach Haggadot that have landed on my desk. It is a custom happily transforming into a personal pre-holiday tradition.

Every immigrant – especially moving from autocracy to democracy – to a new land, new society, new language, new home, to new-found freedom, will likely be sensitized to the story of the Exodus from Egypt.

It is unlikely however that any such modern immigrant would be as sensitized or as understanding of the Exodus story as the Ethiopian Jews who have arrived in Israel these past 30 years.

Their mostly heroic and heart-stopping stories are widely chronicled, but not perhaps widely known by the younger generation of Jews. Thus, the publication by Koren Publishers Jerusalem of the Koren Ethiopian Haggada Journey to Freedom is an exceedingly welcome addition to the already sizable bookshelf of Pesach Haggadot.

As we know, in the Haggadah, the ancient rabbis direct us to see ourselves as if we were the slaves actually exiting ancient Egypt. It is a deeply personal bidding that requires us to stretch our imaginations and feel from the touch of our own experiences, the epochal upheaval of trekking away from slave masters toward an unknown and unknowable future. It is not an easy thing to do for those of us born after the creation of the State of Israel in a land that has not known the falling of rockets and bombs since the War of 1812.

But the Koren Haggada helps us fulfil the rabbinic direction, helps us feel the essential seder command by lifting our thoughts from the realm of imagination to that of actual, recent history.

The Koren Haggada is edited by Rabbi Menachem Waldman, an activist for Ethiopian Jewry and a scholar of their history and folkways. He has compiled a richly informative anthology of original first-person testimonies and stories, documents and photographs, most seen for the first time, of variously poignant aspects of the Ethiopian Jews' experiences in Ethiopia and in the harrowing exodus to the State of Israel.

In the book's foreword, Rabbi Waldman explains his reasons for creating the Koren Haggada. Among his reasons for doing so was the desire "to help introduce Ethiopian Jewry and its particular traditions into the mainstream of Jewish communal heritage. There is nothing like the Haggadah and the seder night to unite all the Jews of the world around a singular experience of their Jewishness. From this point on, the heritage of Ethiopian Jewry will have its place at the Seder table."

Reading from the Koren Ethiopian Haggada Journey to Freedom adds a special dimension of comprehension, self-identification and empathy with the liberation from slavery that are the commanded core of seder night.

"A radical act of empathy" is how the acclaimed novelist Jonathan Safran Foer describes the seder night experience of reading the Haggadah.

"The Haggadah is our book of living memory. We are not merely telling a story here. We are being called to a radical act of empathy. Here we are, embarking on an ancient perennial attempt to give human life – our lives – dignity.

Safran writes these words at the beginning of the New American Haggadah, which he edited (Little, Brown and Company). The New American Haggadah is a thoughtful, imaginative, inventive collaboration among at least eight of the brightest, most creative young Jewish minds today.

The award-winning writer Nathan Englander provides the translations from the Hebrew and Aramaic text into English.

Oded Ezer is the book's designer.

Provocative, insightful commentaries are provided in the text by Nathaniel Deutsch, Jeffrey Goldberg, Rebecca Newberger Goldstein and Lemony Snicket. A historical timeline that appears throughout the Haggadah was compiled by Mia Sara Bruch.

New American Haggadah is a visually stunning work, with as much thought given to its esthetics as to its formidable text. It is a hugely intriguing and exciting effort by a younger, 30-something-plus generation of committed Jews to bring new, different perspectives to the ever-regenerating story of the Exodus.

As Foer notes, "The need for new Haggadahs does not imply the failure of existing ones, but the struggle to engage everyone at the table in a time that has not come before." With obvious deep respect and reverence for the traditions of our people and especially for the irreplaceable role of the Haggadah in enshrining and carrying those traditions forward, Foer, Englander, Ezer and company add immensely to the inter-generational vitality of this wonderfully "radical act of empathy" that we call the Pesach seder.

Running in Jerusalem rain for charity

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, former spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah of Toronto and former president of the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, recently ran in the Jerusalem Marathon, raising more than $2,000 for the Koby Mandell Foundation. Fifteen runners joined Team Koby Mandell and raised over $10,000 for the foundation. It rained and hailed on the runners, but they persisted nevertheless.

Catholic teachers pass resolution on Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Ontario English Catholic Teachers Association (OECTA) recently adopted a statement calling on Israel to lift the "blockade" of Gaza and for Israel to remove the security barrier it constructed "to protect Israelis from acts of terrorist suicide bombers."

The document, passed at the organization's annual general meeting (AGM), held March 10 to 12 in Windsor, states that Israel's "occupation of the West Bank, the existence of illegal Israeli settlements there and their impacts on the lives of Palestinians...along with the siege surrounding Gaza" imposes severe hardships "for basic provisions of education in Palestine."

Although unduly critical of Israel, the resolution adopted by the 45,000-member union could have been worse, said Len Rudner, director of community relations and outreach for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

Document calls for removal of security barrier, end of 'blockade' of Gaza

At one point, a resolution calling for boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) was being advanced by one of the union's locals, but it was sidetracked at the meeting and a less critical one was adopted, he said.

"The resolution is certainly an improvement over the one originally slated for discussion and debate," he said. "The fact that OECTA did not consider a BDS resolution can be seen as another defeat for the folks who say BDS is the only way to bring Israel to heel."

The document adopted by the teachers' group is a statement passed by the sixth World Congress of Education International (EI), a global federation of teachers' unions. The EI document in turn is based on a 2010 resolution of the International Trade Union Confederation.

OECTA president Kevin O'Dwyer said the teachers, in passing the statement, were "trying to find something balanced."

"I'm not sure what the membership will do with this document... It will be in the hands of the members to say where it will go and what we want it to do for us," he said.

At past AGMs, resolutions on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict had been up for consideration but did not reach the floor for a vote. This one was passed by a show-of-hands vote of the 650 teachers attending the meeting, he said.

"This is all part of the ongoing democratic process our organization has been engaged in since 1944," O'Dwyer added.

Clauses included in the statement call on Israeli and Palestinian teachers to urge their governments to end violence and negotiate a settlement. It also resolves to lobby for creation of a Palestinian state, and it "rejects all curricular materials that incite racial and ethnic hatred."

Palestinian Media Watch and the Institute for Monitoring Peace and Cultural Tolerance in School Education have reported on numerous occasions that school texts in the Palestinian territories routinely deny Jewish ties to the land, demonize Israel, reject peace, refer to Israel as occupied Palestinian territory, and urge jihad.

Asked why the resolution failed to single out Palestinian materials and blandly suggested both sides incite hatred, O'Dwyer said the union took a position on "where it wants to go."

He said the document "stands on what it stands on."

Rudner said the statement adopted by OECTA was based on a faulty understanding of history, and although it condemns Israel's West Bank security barrier, "there is no reference within the resolution to the reasons for the fence – 1,200 killed and more than 8,000 wounded in terrorist attacks since 2000."

The resolution refers to Israeli "occupation" but "occupation is not the cause of the problems, it's the result. The hostility of Arab states to Israel predates 1967 [when Israel occupied the West Bank]," Rudner said.

Adding to CIJA's concerns was that "this debate was going on the same time that terrorists in Gaza were pumping 200 missiles into Israel, each an attempt at murder." Some, Rudner noted, landed in Israeli schools.

"OECTA was in Windsor, but they were in a bubble," he said.

Toulouse murders show why Israel is needed

In response to the horrific murder of three Jewish children and a rabbi earlier this month at a Jewish school in Toulouse, France, Eli Wiesel asked: "Will the hatred of the Jews ever finally vanish? Will Jewish children always be in danger?"

He observed: "When a blood-thirsty Jew-hater wants to kill Jews, he goes first to the Jewish schools. Jewish children are his primary target."

Yet speaking of the old, well-established and "dynamic" Jewish community of that city, Wiesel added: "In the streets, you can see Jews wearing yarmulkes. Nobody thinks of antisemitism. Spiritually, it is one of the richest Jewish communities in France."

Others, however, paint a somewhat different picture – describing Jews who are afraid to wear yarmulkes publicly.

Jean-Yves Camus of the Institute of International and Strategic Relations in France noted (in Ha'aretz on March 20) that "although the Toulouse killings are the most dramatic and deadly anti-Jewish action for decades, they are only the most shocking among the 400 antisemitic incidents that are recorded every year by the community's protection service, the SPCJ. Since the beginning of the second intifadah in 2000, the level of antisemitic attacks has been rising, with a peak of more than 900 in 2004. And regardless of the real efforts of the French government, police and justice authorities, the level of attacks remains much higher than in the 1990s."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The rise in antisemitism has been noted in a report by the Anti-Defamation League that was (coincidentally) released on March 20 and picked up by some major media outlets, including Reuters. According to the study, "pernicious antisemitic beliefs continue to be held [overall] by nearly one-third of those surveyed" – with levels up in nine of 10 European countries surveyed.

Nearly a quarter of French citizens hold antisemitic attitudes, an increase of 20 per cent since 2009. This compares with 63 per cent of Hungarians, 53 per cent of Spaniards, and 48 per cent of Poles. The lowest numbers in the study were found in Britain (17 per cent) and Germany (21 per cent). Indicators included whether respondents believe Jews have too much power in business, are more loyal to Israel than to their own country, or "talk too much" about the Holocaust.

"The survey is disturbing by the fact that antisemitism remains at high levels across the continent and infects many Europeans at a much higher level than we see here in the United States," warned Abraham Foxman of the ADL.

In the March 21 Globe and Mail, reporting from Toulouse, Doug Saunders observed that in response to threats from the far-right in France, the Jewish community had taken all sorts of security measures at the school, including security guards, iron gates, high walls and video surveillance. Sadly, no measure provides total protection against a determined killer.

Saunders is right to point out Jew-hatred from the radical right, which also directs hatred toward Muslim immigrants. But as the Toulouse murders demonstrate, Jew-hatred from Muslim extremists is also a serious concern.

Antisemitism is spread not just by the violent ideology at the core of Jihadi organizations such as Al Qaeda, Hamas, and Islamic Jihad, but also among elements in even "moderate" Muslim states like Turkey.

As the Times of Israel reported last week: "In an unprecedented move, a bipartisan U.S. commission tracking global religious freedom has recommended that the State Department name Turkey on its annual list of 'countries of particular concern.' It marks the first time a NATO ally has been designated as a nation whose government has engaged in, or tolerated, systematic and egregious violations of the universal right to freedom of religion and belief... The commission also calls out Turkey – along with Saudi Arabia, Iran, and Venezuela – for its promotion and tolerance of antisemitism."

As last week's events confirm, antisemitism can rear its ugly head in any society – from advanced democracies to theocratic dictatorships. The need for a Jewish national home in Israel, as a beacon of hope and a guarantor of security for Jews everywhere, is as real today as it was in 1948.

CIJA liaises with communities

"We have undertaken a long and comprehensive process of ensuring a maximum level of security – not necessarily meaning a maximum amount of security – for the community," Fogel said.

Shimon Fogel

That process, he said, includes liaising with all communities, updating and upgrading security protocols, and auditing public institutions. It also involves ongoing communication with police and the recent launch of CIJA's "community security network" initiative, which aims to create a watch group made up of community volunteers.

"We communicated with the community... and indicated [there was] no change in the threat assessment level as a result of the Toulouse tragedy. We maintain that position, while providing information, reassurance and backup to communities or specific institutions requesting it," he said.

Doron Horowitz, CIJA's director of national security infrastructure, would not go into detail on how he is specifically advising schools on proper security protocols, but he confirmed that he had spoken to numerous day schools and fielded many calls last week from apprehensive community members and institutions.

"For obvious and justified reasons, people are extremely upset. But security is not emotionally driven. As a professional, my message [to schools] is always on emergency preparedness, to have measures in place to prevent such occurrences," Horowitz said.

"Schools, synagogues and other Jewish institutions already have guidelines, protocols and policies [on security]... any time there's an incident, it's another good time to review security measures."

A heartfelt plea for increased light

Chava (Eva) Sandler, the widow of Rabbi Jonathan Sandler, who was murdered during the attack on the Toulouse, France, school last week, released the following statement.

My heart is broken. I am unable to speak. There are no ways for me to be able to express the great and all-consuming pain resulting from the murder of my dear husband, Rabbi Jonathan, and our sons, Arieh and Gabriel, and of Miriam Monsonego, daughter of the dedicated principal of Ozar Hatorah and his wife, Rabbi Yaakov and Mrs. Monsonego.

May no one ever have to endure such pain and suffering.

Because so many of you, my cherished brothers and sisters in France and around the world, are asking what you can do on my behalf, on behalf of my daughter, Liora, and on behalf of the souls of my dear husband and children, I feel that, difficult though it may be, it is incumbent upon me to answer your entreaties.

My husband's life was dedicated to teaching Torah. We moved back to the country of his birth [from Israel] to help young people learn about the beauty of Torah. He was truly a good man, loving, giving and selfless. He was sensitive to all of God's creatures, always searching for ways to reveal the goodness in others.

He and I raised Arieh and Gabriel to live the ways of Torah. Who would have known how short would be their time on this Earth, how short would be the time I would be with them as their mother?

I don't know how I and my husband's parents and sister will find the consolation and strength to carry on, but I know that the ways of God are good, and He will reveal the path and give us the strength to continue. I know that their holy souls will remain with us forever, and I know that very soon the time will come when we will be together again with the coming of Moshiach.

I wholeheartedly believe in the words of the verse: "The Lord has given, and the Lord has taken away; blessed be the Name of the Lord." I thank the Almighty for the privilege, short though it was, of raising my children together with my husband. Now the Almighty wants them back with Him.

To all those who wish to bring consolation to our family and contentment to the souls of the departed: let's continue their lives on this Earth. Parents, please kiss your children. Tell them how much you love them, and how dear it is to your heart that they be living examples of our Torah, imbued with the fear of Heaven and with love of their fellow man.

Please increase your study of Torah, whether on your own or with your family and friends. Help others who may find study difficult to achieve alone.

Please bring more light into the world by kindling the Sabbath candles this and every Friday night. The holiday of Passover is approaching. Please invite another person into your homes so that all have a place at a seder to celebrate the holiday of our freedom.

Along with our tearful remembrance of our trials in Egypt so many years ago, we still tell over how "in each and every generation, they have stood against us to destroy us." We all will announce in a loud and clear voice: "God saves us from their hands."

The spirit of the Jewish People can never be extinguished. Its connection with Torah and its commandments can never be destroyed.

May it be God's will that from this moment on we will all only know happiness.

I send my heartfelt condolences to the Monsonego family for the loss of their daughter, Miriam, and I pray for the speedy recovery of Aharon ben Leah, who was injured in the attack.

Thank you for your support and love.

PA's way a parody

Every now and then, at regular intervals of publicly bemoaned protestations of victimhood, the Palestinian Authority (PA) has demanded tangible displays of "confidence-building measures" from Israel. Occasionally, not always – usually when the United States privately echoes those PA protests – the government of Israel complies. It invariably releases Palestinian prisoners, decreases the number of roadblocks on roads from the West Bank leading into Israel or increases trade, commercial or other permits for Palestinian businessmen, entrepreneurs and merchants.

But the reverse has never happened – at least not since September 1993 in Washington, D.C., when a Palestinian leader actually signed a document witnessed by the president of the United States rejecting violence and committing his people to a peaceful resolution of their conflict with Israel. That leader, alas, soon proved himself to be a liar. And the Palestinians have seldom, if ever, extended any confidence-building measures toward the people of Israel since then.

In fact, the Palestinian leadership regularly does the opposite. It diminishes the level of confidence that the "ordinary" Israeli yearns to feel toward them.

Last week, we saw the latest dispiriting, confidence-destroying behaviour.

Following the precedent of the infamous Goldstone inquiry for which the PA clamoured after Israel's war with Hamas in Gaza in 2008, the PA sought and obtained last Thursday from the 47-member United Nations Human Rights Council the establishment of an "independent international fact-finding mission to investigate the implications of the Israeli settlements on the civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights of the Palestinian people throughout the occupied Palestinian territory, including east Jerusalem."

Like the tainted, corrupt body that created it, like the discredited inquiry into Israel's conduct in the Gaza war, this latest UN inquiry of Israel conduct will be a travesty to truth, a sick parody and a wound to real concern over human rights abuses around the world.

In response to the council vote, Israel's foreign ministry said: "The Palestinians must understand that they can't have it both ways: they can't enjoy co-operation with Israel and at the same time initiate political clashes in international forums. Had the Palestinians wanted to solve the settlements issue, they would resume without delay a direct and unconditional negotiation on all core issues within the framework of a comprehensive agreement." Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird, in condemning the council vote, effectively agreed. "We continue to call for direct negotiations between the two parties without preconditions."

So do we. So should all governments and people who seek peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

The CIA "ran" a high-level spy in Israel's military from 1982 to '84, senior U.S. official sources told the Jerusalem Post. The spy was reportedly unhappy with Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon and volunteered to give limited classified information. Minnesota Republican senator David Durenberger said the U.S. move prompted Israel to accept information from U.S. Navy analyst Jonathan Pollard.

If Israeli ambassador is expelled

The Obama administration has indicated that it is willing to do business with Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood. The Egyptian parliament, controlled by the Muslim Brotherhood, recently passed a resolution to the effect that Israel's ambassador to Egypt should be expelled. It would be interesting to see how U.S. President Barack Obama responds to this outrageous act, which violates international law and decorum, and contravenes the provisions of the peace treaty between Egypt and Israel. It may be time for Obama to suggest that if Egypt proceeds with this decision, the United States will cancel all military and economic aid to Egypt. That will be a true test to Obama's stated commitment to peace and security to Israel.

Free day school tuition

Calgary's communal initiative to offer three years free day school tuition to incoming families will surely bear good fruit for many years in the city ("Day school tuition waived in Calgary," March 22). Each child who is enabled in this way to connect fully with our heritage is a new world in the Jewish universe. Jewish education is the greatest key to Jewish continuity and the ongoing strength of our community. So what are the rest of us doing? Especially in Ontario, where the majority of Jewish children are deprived of a Jewish day school education, largely due to the oppressive costs, how many myriad worlds are being lost? As a community we need to aggressively remove all barriers to Jewish education. Why are we not doing it? We don't have the resources? Is the issue not important enough? What issue is more important or has a greater impact on the Jewish community?

Potential for human destruction

I read the excerpts from the address by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu with dread in my heart ("We must remain masters of our fate," March 15). As a 99-year-old woman, I recall vividly the reports of nuclear attacks in Japan that flattened cities and killed thousands of people and contaminated all forms of life for miles around. A bomb such as those, if launched by Iran to destroy Israel, would wipe out entire countries in the Middle East. An Israeli attack that would destroy Iranian underground nuclear facilities would also destroy other nations and humanity far and wide. Surely, we cannot have forgotten Hiroshima and Nagasaki and the potential for human destruction that imperils us all!

Anu banu artza

On Daniel Pipes' website, there is a video of him in an Israeli Knesset committee meeting on Islamic immigration to Israel – a really interesting phenomenon. In it, he gives a survey of what is going on in the Middle East. He states that Egypt is an importer of food for some 80 million people. However, its foreign reserves, which are used to buy food, have declined by about two-thirds during the last year. This is a scary thought, in light of your comments about Israeli agricultural technology ("Inspired by a song," From the editor's desk, March 22). From Egypt's perspective, much of the solution to their forthcoming problem is right next door.

Regarding the song Anu banu artza, when I lived in Israel, I learned some other words to it that went like this: "Anu banu artza, litfos kol banot bah." This roughly translates as: "We are coming to live in Israel, to catch all the girls there." I am sure there were many Zionist pioneers who adopted that approach as well as the traditional one, "Anu banu artza, livnot [to build] u'lihibanot ba [and be ourselves built as well in the process]."

Survivor's view of antisemitism today

I am grateful to Ralph Schleichkorn for his letter to the editor about the Holocaust years in Romania, during which close to 400,000 Romanian Jews were murdered ("Remembering the Struma," March 15). Thank you for reminding CJN readers about the tragic fate of the vessels Struma (790 victims) and Mefkure (394 victims). The present waves of antisemitism, which often manifests as hate for Israel, reminds me, a Holocaust survivor, about the black years, 1939 to 1944.

The spirit of Bin Laden lives

Avi Issacharoff
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

There is no way of knowing for certain whether Mohamed Merah, the suspect in last week's terror attack in Toulouse, was in fact an Al Qaeda member.

He claimed to be, but both he and the organization had a common interest in saying so. Indeed, it is not clear how active Al Qaeda is at the moment, if at all, or whether Merah was a lone activist following the organization's ideology, but not its instructions.

The U.S. assassination of Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden last May seriously damaged the morale of his supporters, but not their motivation. Immediately after his death, his loyalists had a glut of plans to attack western targets. But they face more complicated issues than the killing of their leader – primarily, the fact that the United States and other nations have broken the organization's infrastructure in East Asia, South Africa and the Arab states. Thousands of Al Qaeda militants have been assassinated in the past few years, in countless operations.

Nevertheless, jihadis are undoubtedly still scattered around the world, including in Europe and the United States. In many European cities, Muslim neighbourhoods and slums have become fertile ground for extremist ideology, with some imams ranting against the West and Jews.

Merah apparently worked alongside his brother and perhaps with the knowledge of a friend, but Al Qaeda leader Ayman al-Zawahiri probably knew nothing about his intentions. But ultimately, even if Merah "only" shared Al Qaeda's views and was not an integral part of the organization, it's clear that extremist Islam is trying to lash out in order to prove it is still relevant in the wake of the Arab Spring.

Merah, who died following a shoot-out with French police, was a "classic" candidate for Al Qaeda membership. He was 23 years old, of Algerian descent, and visited Pakistan and Afghanistan. In France, he joined the Knights of Pride, a radical Salafi group that France outlawed last January after it called for non-recognition of the country's secular, democratic regime. The French security forces had group members, including Merah, under surveillance, but he managed to give them the slip.

In many senses, the terrorist from Toulouse was a relatively small headache for western intelligence. He was a known target, they had information about him, and he was under surveillance. The more meaningful threat in Europe and the United States is from dormant, unknown activists, who are believed to be present in every major European city. Some were born there, others emigrated from Muslim countries.

The four people murdered last week in Toulouse, Rabbi Jonathan Sandler, his sons Arieh, 5, and Gabriel, 3, and eight-year-old Myriam Monsenego were laid to rest in Israel. [Israel Sun photo]

Alongside the events in Toulouse, Egypt reportedly arrested two suspects last Wednesday in a plot to strike a Western ship entering the Suez Canal. The two, apparently Islamic extremists, wanted to hit both western targets and the Egyptian economy.

The extremists are displeased by Egypt's transformation and the growing strength of political Islam there, namely among the Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafi Al-Nour party. In Iraq, Sunni organizations continue to launch terror attacks, and in Syria, a Sunni group claimed responsibility for recent car bombings in Damascus that left dozens dead.

Osama bin Laden may be dead, but his doctrine and ideas are alive and kicking.

Israel arrested Mohamed Merah in 2010: report

Anshel Pfeffer
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TOULOUSE, France — Mohamed Merah, the Toulouse shooter, was arrested by Israel Police in Jerusalem in 2010, after he was found in possession of a knife, the head of the French intelligence agency DCRI said in an interview last Friday. Bernard Squarcini told the French newspaper Le Monde that Merah, who killed four people in an attack on a Jewish school in Toulouse on March 19, was held by police in Jerusalem during his visit to Israel in 2010, but was released shortly after his detainment.

Squarcini said that Merah visited several other Middle Eastern countries during that trip, including Turkey, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, and Afghanistan. He said that French intelligence tracked him and investigated to see if he was suspicious, but found that he had not been engaging in any ideological activism or religious activity.

Squarcini responded to allegations about French intelligence services' failures during the hunt for Merah.

According to a report published in Le Monde last Thursday, Merah was not a member of any well-known Islamic terrorist organization, but did undergo a process of radicalization. Merah was also added to a "no fly" list maintained by U.S. authorities some time ago, two American officials told Reuters. The officials would not disclose when Merah was placed on the list.

Meanwhile, a little-known extremist group last Thursday claimed responsibility for a series of deadly shootings in France, saying they were in response to what it called "Israel's crimes" against the Palestinians.

Last Thursday, a 32-hour siege by French police outside the home of the suspected perpetrator of the March 19 Toulouse school shootings, ended when police raided the apartment, prompting the 24-year-old suspect to jump out a window and fall to his death.

In a statement made after the siege ended, French President Nicolas Sarkozy said that Muslim citizens of France are not responsible for the "crazy" actions of the perpetrator of the Toulouse shootings, and that all people who consult hate or terrorism websites will be punished by the authorities.

The French citizen of Algerian origin told negotiators he killed three soldiers two weeks ago and four people at a Jewish school in Toulouse on March 19 to avenge the deaths of Palestinian children and because of French army involvement in Afghanistan.

The huge operation, involving hundreds of investigators and police, started only in the afternoon of March 19, in the aftermath of the shooting at the Ozar Hatorah school in Toulouse, despite the fact that four days earlier, after the murder of two French soldiers, it was clear that the perpetrator was repeating himself, and that he was liable to attack again.

For a number of days, security forces believed that neo-Nazis were responsible for the killings, and dismissed other possible lines of inquiry, even though it seemed as if Merah was under the radar of the security forces, and that he was known to them as a radical Islamist operative.

Those slain at the Jewish school, Rabbi Jonathan Sandler, his sons Arieh, 5, and Gabriel, 3, and eight-year-old Myriam Monsenego, were buried in Israel last Wednesday.

Meanwhile, several French Muslim and Jewish leaders appeared united on French television after the attack in Toulouse, but officials within the Jewish community have no illusions: French Jews and Muslims are deeply divided.

"Don't tell me French Muslims appreciate Jews – 50 per cent of them hate Jews," Rabbi Michel Sarfati told Ha'aretz recently. The rabbi founded the Jewish-Muslim friendship group. "Many hate Jews because extremist imams denigrate Jews in their sermons. They say we're Israel's puppets. Moderate Muslims try to fight this hatred, but they're being threatened, and they get no support from the state."

The killing in Toulouse has not improved relations between the communities.

"Look at the Internet forums – some extremist leaders criticize the Jews for getting sympathy after the killing," said Rabbi Sarfati.

In response to the death of Merah, David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, released the following statement: "We are gratified that French authorities have acted with diligence to put an end to this sadistic individual's campaign of terrorism. As reports have revealed, the killer was inspired by a virulent anti-western ideology, which included but was not limited to a murderous hatred of Jews.

"It pains our community to know that those murdered at the Ozar Hatorah school were targeted for one reason – they were Jews."

All who hunger, let them come and eat

I want to share some fabulous news with you, and just in time for Passover: I'm about to become fabulously wealthy. It happened rather suddenly and through a series of wonderful e-mails cascading into my inbox.

It seem that a distant relative has passed away. Although I've never heard of him, I am – so I'm told – his nearest of kin, and poised to inherit a substantial fortune. I will receive the first instalment any day now, just as soon as I transfer a transaction fee into a Nigerian bank account. And by uncanny coincidence, I've been asked to help a widow in Somalia by depositing a large cheque into my bank account and wiring her a mere 20 per cent of that amount immediately.

While I don't have these funds in hand just yet, the prospect leaves me feeling flush enough to wire several thousand dollars to each of several friends in dire straits. Although I haven't heard from any of them in years, I received e-mails from them only yesterday. They each tell me they've been pickpocketed in London. Yes, they lost everything – cash, credit cards, passport, airline tickets. They're stranded without a sou. Tough place, London.

Those of you with e-mail accounts – and, really, is there anyone out there who doesn't do e-mail? – are surely nodding your heads. We all receive such scamming invitations in our inboxes. And even when we can't quite figure out how they work, we know enough (I hope) not to take the bait.

This week I received a particularly shameful variation on the theme. In it, someone claiming to work for a Swiss bank in charge of dormant accounts explains that he has uncovered a secret account that belonged to someone murdered in the Holocaust who has no living heirs. My correspondent is prepared to give me the information I require to identify myself (fraudulently, one presumes) as an heir to the "Holocaust Claims Processing Office" so that he and I collect and share $21 million.

My first thought was that the letter was disgracefully targeting Holocaust survivors and their families, who may indeed have lost all their possessions during the war. The language of the e-mail suggested that it involved a legitimate organization concerned with following through on such property claims. Perhaps I received it because the sender trolled various lists for Jewish names, hoping to reach someone made vulnerable and gullible by difficult personal circumstance.

As I reread it, however, it occurred to me that the target of the scam might fit an entirely different profile. The e-mail played, I think, on antisemitic stereotypes, and fantasies that the doomed Jews of Europe were fabulously wealthy – I mean, $21 million! And the (presumably) fabricated name of the bank employee was a

in Toronto

German name, not a Jewish one. The offer tendered in the e-mail was not to repatriate the funds to their proper heir, but, in essence, to help someone pass himself off as an heir, even though he was not. In other words, for someone taken in by the e-mail and convinced of its accuracy, the goal was to defraud the family who had a legitimate claim to the account.

"Who falls for these things?" I hear you ask. The needy and the greedy, who both hunger, empty and vulnerable, but in different ways.

And as Pesach approaches, it occurs to me that our vulnerability to the fantasies inspired by such scams (if not to the scams themselves) comes from a kind of enslavement that the holiday pushes against.

Our seder ritual begins by announcing our responsibility for that hunger and emptiness. Halachma anya, we begin: this poor bread, our matzah, sign of both our enslavement and our redemption. However meagre it may be, we offer to share it. In giving away what we have to those whose neediness is a physical thing, a mark of poverty, we let go of a different kind of neediness – one that sometimes causes folks to hoard things for themselves alone, and to prize objects and acquisition more than people and values.

Let those who hunger come and eat. In feeding them, we nourish ourselves.

Rabbis then and now

Writing perceptively about Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut of blessed memory, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein concluded her last CJN column with a pertinent question: "Who would you consider a giant who can stand in the shadow that Rabbi Plaut cast?"

I'm between the generations of Plaut and Goldstein. In fact, as Rabbi Goldstein, just out of rabbinic school, became one of my colleagues at Holy Blossom Temple at the same time as I joined the congregation, I feel challenged to offer a response to her important rhetorical question.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

I believe that the time when rabbis cast shadows has passed. Although we may all remember the spiritual leaders we encountered in our youth as giants, in previous generations, such memories had some basis in reality. That's rarely, if ever, the case today.

Then they represented an age when hierarchy in worship services, in synagogues no less than in churches, could be illustrated by a pyramid, with someone high above who was well positioned to cast a shadow. Even the architecture of places of worship promoted it.

It was a time when scholarship was appreciated and active engagement in the community at large expected and applauded. Recent history can point to many examples across the denominational divide when rabbis seemed to matter more as leaders than as friends.

In our time, the pyramid has been replaced by a circle in which everybody is an equal. When all are on the same plane, casting shadows is well-nigh impossible. Rabbis aren't expected to be leaders in the traditional sense, but counsellors, facilitators, fundraisers and promoters.

Look at the way worship services are organized in many communities. A friend just told me of a debate in her church about whether to keep the pews or exchange them for movable chairs as a tangible way of replacing hierarchy with democracy.

Many rabbis are, indeed, still greatly appreciated, but not because they stand in the pulpit above the congregation to proclaim the Truth, but because they aspire to be lovable human beings and everybody's friends. That's not how I remember the rabbis of my early years and, I'm afraid, that's probably not the way I was perceived by many.

Yes, I, too, wanted to be loved, but I settled for being respected. My aim was to help Jews to know Judaism and sense the sacred by looking up to Heaven in awe, humility and gratitude. By contrast, in the modern synagogue, with or without pews, the intention is to look at each other in search of spirituality, which, however desirable, is very different from holiness.

Religious life has moved from the vertical to the horizontal, from the theological to the sociological. That's also why conventional sermons have ceased to be of much consequence.

Rabbi Plaut was a consummate preacher and a commanding personality. Some younger rabbis have recently speculated whether he, and rabbis like him, would find employment in today's congregations. The outcome was by no means conclusive.

What communities now seem to be looking for are individuals who can combine affability with pastoral skills and organizational acumen. When I started out in the rabbinate, people wanted to know the subject of my next sermon and what classes I was teaching, even how much I had published. Nowadays, I surmise, rabbis are asked at how many life-cycle events they've officiated and how much money they've raised.

When congregants believe that their rabbi hasn't visited them enough or see that the synagogue finances are down, they may decide to fire him or her. If you always fear that your job is on the line, you're not likely worry about how much shadow you cast but how to survive.

Before readers come to the erroneous conclusion that this is the rant of a disillusioned old rabbi, let me assure them, first, that I look back on my five decades of service to the Jewish people with humble gratitude, much satisfaction and totally without rancour.

Second, I'm by no means sure that the hierarchic system in which I was reared and which Rabbi Plaut reflected was preferable to the democratic nature of contemporary religious life that seeks to reach out and connect with individuals and thus find the presence of God.

Every age has its own way. The present way is appropriate for this time. I salute its exponents and celebrate with them, whether or not they cast shadows.

A beacon of hope in a land of gathering darkness

On July 13, 1933, about six months after Adolf Hitler ascended to power, William Dodd, 64, disembarked in Hamburg to take up his post as the first U.S. ambassador to Nazi Germany. He was accompanied by his wife and two grown children, Martha, who had been an assistant literary editor on a major metropolitan daily, and Bill, a history teacher.

For the Dodds, the posting would be a once-in-a-lifetime journey of discovery, transformation and disillusionment.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Dodd was in the process of writing a multi-volume history of the old American South when he reached out to his friend, the secretary of commerce in President Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration, for an ambassadorship in Europe. Dodd, the chair of the University of Chicago's history department, the biographer of former American president Woodrow Wilson and a Democratic party activist, sought out a quiet, undemanding sinecure that would enable him to finish his ambitious project. He was offered the ambassadorship in Germany, which had to be filled quickly.

Though not well versed in the niceties of diplomacy, Dodd was a respectable candidate. He had earned his Ph.D. at the University of Leipzig, spoke German and knew Germany.

When he had completed his mission 4-1/2 years later, he was thoroughly disgusted with the new Germany, as was his daughter. Their odyssey, a cautionary tale, is told in Erik Larson's captivating book, In the Garden of Beasts: Love, Terror and an American Family in Hitler's Berlin (Crown), which is due to be made into a Hollywood movie.

Dodd's mandate was to ensure that Germany did not default on its debts to U.S. banks and report on Germany's maltreatment of its Jewish citizens.

Prior to his departure, he met Roosevelt and consulted with government officials and Jewish leaders. Although the president was appalled by the growing antisemitism in Germany, he had not condemned it publicly, fearing the political costs. Isolationists, for example, maintained that Nazi oppression of Jews was a domestic matter.

Mindful of these considerations, Roosevelt acknowledged that Germany was treating Jews "shamefully," but instructed Dodd not to intervene in German affairs. Col. Edward House, Roosevelt's close adviser, urged Dodd to "ameliorate Jewish sufferings," but in a revealing caveat that implied that Jews were partly responsible for their troubles, he observed that German Jews should not be permitted "to dominate economic or intellectual life in Berlin, as they have done for a long time."

American Jews urged Dodd to press Roosevelt for official intervention. He promised to "exert all possible personal influence against the unjust treatment of German Jews."

As Larson suggests, Dodd himself was ambivalent about antisemitism. He decried "the ruthlessness that is being applied to Jews" in Germany, but thought that Germans had "a valid grievance" because Jews "held a great many more of the key positions in Germany than their numbers or their talents entitled them to."

Martha Dodd, 24, displayed ambivalence toward Jews, too, admitting that she was "slightly antisemitic" in terms of her acceptance of the pervasive American attitude that they were neither as physically attractive or as socially desirable as gentiles.

When Dodd landed in Germany, he was already certain what his role as ambassador should be. Rather than being a mere observer, he believed, he should try to exercise a moderating influence over Hitler and his regime.

In seeking out a residence in central Berlin, from which he could leisurely walk to the U.S. embassy, Dodd chose a property immediately south of the Tiergarten, a magnificent park that, in literal translation, means "garden of the beasts." Once a hunting preserve for royalty, the Tiergarten was and currently is a vast, peaceful preserve of woods, meadows, gardens and paths stretching from the Brandenburg Gate to the Charlottenburg district.

Dodd rented the house from its proprietor, Alfred Panofsky, a Jewish banker who reserved the top floor for himself and his mother, hoping that this arrangement would shield them from Nazi violence.

Dodd's tenure in Berlin was stormy from the outset. One of his first tasks was to issue a formal protest to the foreign minister over attacks by Nazi goons on American visitors. In what must have come as a surprising admission, the minister agreed that Germany's treatment of Jews was incorrect.

With the passage of time, Dodd's attitude to the regime grew more critical, likening the Nazis to "half-educated statesmen." In private, he was far more scathing, describing "the whole gang" around Hitler as "a horde of criminals."

Dodd's daughter, Martha, was not as critical. She was inclined to think the best of the new order in Germany and tried "to find excuses" for Nazi "excesses." Blonde, attractive and flirtatious, she had an affair with the first chief of the Gestapo, Rudolf Diels, but the man she loved was Boris Winogradov, a Soviet diplomat who doubled as an intelligence agent of the NKVD, the precursor of the KGB.

Dodd's outspokenness was less than appreciated in the U.S. State Department. His boss, William Phillips, urged him to keep a low profile and not "to give public expression to anything in the nature of criticism" of the regime.

In the first of his two meetings with Hitler, Dodd came away with the impression that he was sincerely peace loving. The embassy's consul general, George Messersmith, warned him that Hitler desired peace only on his own terms. Eventually, Dodd adopted the position that Hitler wanted peace to prepare for war.

Dodd's stance on the "Jewish problem" also evolved. Recalling a conversation with Hitler in which he threatened to "make a complete end to all [Jews] in this country," and observing the tide of antisemitism washing over Germany, he concluded that Nazi persecution was systematic. As for Martha, she would recognize that Nazi antisemitism was a national pastime and that "a heartbreaking system of terror ruled the country and repressed ... the people."

The Tiergarten in Berlin

Morally repulsed by the regime, Dodd stopped attending Nazi party rallies in Nuremberg, a move that unnerved his superiors in Washington and prompted them to call for his removal. The Nazis, in turn, regarded him as an intractable opponent.

Bowing to State Department pressure, Roosevelt concurred that Dodd should be recalled. His replacement, Hugh Wilson, was a career diplomat who, writes Larson, "sought to emphasize the positive aspects of Nazi Germany and carried on a one-man campaign of appeasement."

Returning to the United States in January 1938, Dodd hit the lecture circuit, delivered speeches warning of Germany's hegemonic ambitions and of Hitler's intention to murder Jews. In his memoir, Rabbi Stephen Wise, president of the Zionist Organization of America, wrote that "Dodd was years ahead of the State Department in his grasp of the political as well as of the moral implications of Hitlerism and paid the penalty of such understanding."

In conclusion, Larson notes that he was "a lone beacon of American freedom and hope in a land of gathering darkness."

Teacher's interests converge in his classroom

By Frances Kraft

Matthew Cooper – a 30-year-old American with a background in environmentalism and Israel programs – has taken a roundabout route to the Grade 1, 2 and 3 classroom at Toronto's Montessori Jewish Day School, where he began teaching this year.

In addition to a BA in philosophy, he has a diploma in elementary education from the Toronto Montessori Institute.

Before moving to Toronto, his wife's hometown, Cooper also trained as a wilderness steward with the Wilderness Education Association, and studied at the Eco-Activist Beit Midrash of Yeshivat Simchat Shlomo (inspired by the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach) in Jerusalem.

He has been married to Risa Alyson Cooper (formerly Strauss), director of Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs and founder of the Kavanah Garden on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, for the past year and a half. They met at the Tevá Learning Center, an outdoor education centre in Connecticut.

Cooper, who was born in Indianapolis and raised in Chicago, first realized his love of the outdoors as an undergraduate studying philosophy at Southern Illinois University. Although he had been thinking of a career in academia, his school's proximity to the Shawnee National Forest piqued his interest in the environment.

As part of his course work, he "explored lots of different religions," and later, in Israel, he studied informally in alternative Orthodox forums.

After university, Cooper travelled extensively, and made his first foray into young adult education helping to lead Birthright Israel trips. In 2006, he worked on the Hava & Adam Ecology Farm in Modi'in, which brought in school groups. It was his first experience working with younger children, and he loved it.

His interests, including music, all converge in the classroom. "I've never been formally trained, but I've been playing guitar since high school," he said. He often brings his guitar to school and leads the class in singing Jewish and/or environmental songs.

"I have a great song about composting," he added. It ties in to a recent initiative – bringing a worm-composting program into his classroom.

Music, Cooper noted, is "a powerful tool to bring people together and to learn things in a fun way."

A lesson from the teacher: "Children are given a lot of freedom here [at MJDS], and they're being entrusted with the responsibility to make wise choices... Where the bar is set is where they ultimately come to, so it's very important for that to be high, because each child's potential is limitless."

Buhlers to be honoured at Winnipeg Negev Gala

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This year's Jewish National Fund of Canada – Manitoba/Saskatchewan Region Negev Gala, on June 5, will honour philanthropists Bonnie and John Buhler.

"It is truly a privilege for the Jewish National Fund to pay tribute to Bonnie and John," said JNF regional president Mel Lazareck. "They have generously committed themselves to Manitoba and remain passionate leaders in philanthropy."

The Buhlers have always been modest individuals. This writer recalls an interview he did with John Buhler more than 25 years ago. At the time, he was the owner of a farm-equipment manufacturing plant with some 200 employees. Yet his office furniture consisted of a bridge table and chairs and some bookcases.

"We don't like a whole lot of attention," Buhler says.

He says that he and his wife are "humbled" by the JNF honour. "We couldn't fathom why the JNF chose us," Buhler says. "Our first reaction is that we are not even Jewish."

The Buhlers earned the honour, however – as with the many honorees both Jewish and non-Jewish – for their generous commitment to the people of Manitoba and their leadership in philanthropy.

In a sense, the Buhlers have picked up where the late Israel and Barbara (Babs) Asper – previous Negev Gala honorees - left off. In the late 1990s and early 2000s, the Aspers and the Asper Foundation endowed numerous community institutions such as the I. H. Asper School of Business at the University of Manitoba, the Asper Clinical Research Institute at the St. Boniface Hospital, the Asper Jewish Community Campus and many others, culminating in the drive to open the Canadian Museum for Human Rights (CMHR) in Winnipeg.

Philanthropists John and Bonnie Buhler

In similar fashion, in the past few years, the Buhlers have contributed $4 million to the construction of the University of Winnipeg's Buhler Centre, $2 million to the Buhler Eye Care Centre of Excellence that is being built at the Misericordia Community Hospital, $800,000 to establish the Buhler Welcome Centre at the Manitoba Children's Museum – to mention a few – and more than $600,000 toward construction of the CMHR.

Also, like Israel Asper, Buhler is a self-made business success who hails originally from rural Manitoba.

Buhler grew up in Morden, a community about 200 kilometres southwest of Winnipeg. While he got his start in business working for his father-in-law, Buhler earned his reputation as a businessman through his ability to buy failing manufacturing enterprises and turn them into success stories. His career in manufacturing culminated with his purchase of Versatile Tractor, Canada's last remaining tractor manufacturer, in 2000. He sold the factory to a Russian buyer in 2007 and then retired to full-time philanthropic work.

Buhler credits his wife for steering him in a philanthropic direction. The couple works as a team to determine which projects to support. Five years ago, they received the Variety Club Gold Heart Humanitarian of the Year award. Last fall, John Buhler was awarded an honorary degree from the University of Manitoba.

The Buhlers have been to Israel a couple of times in the past but, Buhler notes, it has been many years since their last visit. "We are looking forward to our upcoming trip and will determine while there which project we want to support with the funds raised at the gala," he says.

Bonnie says that she and her husband are impressed with the contributions that the JNF makes to the people of Israel. "John and I greatly appreciate the JNF's commitment to enhancing quality of life by partnering with other organizations and local municipalities to provide employment and education opportunities, building reservoirs and agricultural infrastructure to bring economic viability to newly developed areas and generally improving the self-image of a community," she says.

The melody lingers: Remembering Srul Irving Glick

There have been many photographs taken of one of Canada's most celebrated composers, Srul Irving Glick, of blessed memory. He made a point of attending the numerous world premières of his works. And inevitably at every event, a photographer would capture the moment.

There are pictures of Srul receiving any of the seven Grand Prix du Disque awards and a Juno Award for albums he had produced over his 25 years with the CBC. There are formal photographs of Srul being awarded a Governor General's Award in 1992 and receiving the Order of Canada in 1994, and there are informal photographs of Srul by his piano or conducting the Beth Tikvah Synagogue choir. All the pictures taken of Srul share one thing in common: they show him smiling broadly.

Guest Voice

Rabbi Wayne Allen

I remember many things about Srul, with whom I worked for 15 years. There were the gatherings in his home where the greats of the music world would come to quietly socialize, spontaneously transformed into concerts. The European salons of the 18th and 19th centuries were reproduced in Srul's Toronto house.

There were the staff meetings at Beth Tikvah when Srul would argue that a religious service that does not bring worshippers closer to God is a failure. And music, he would insist, is the most effective vehicle for making the human-divine connection. There were the Shabbatot when he would escort his elderly father, once a cantor of note from whom he learned much, into the synagogue sanctuary with glowing pride. I remember hearing Srul's voice singing along with the choir he was conducting. But what I will always remember best is his smile.

Even when he was going through a series of debilitating treatments for the illness that claimed his life at the age of 77 he was smiling. Sitting with him in his hospital room, I asked him how he seemed so positive. His glib answer was that he had no alternative. His thoughtful answer was that throughout his life he never had any expectations. And without expectations, he never suffered disappointment. If disappointment is the source of unhappiness, he had no reason to be unhappy. His smile was the product of his outlook.

Srul was a composer of the first rank. He composed music of the highest calibre in almost every conceivable form. But he was also, I learned, a wise man, if not a bona fide philosopher. He was correct when it came to his assessment of the role of music in liturgy. And Srul was correct in his view of how to approach the vicissitudes of life.

Srul was not a champion of the kind of juvenile music heard in many synagogues today, reducing a serious prayer experience to a summer camp sing-along. Nor was he a champion of the breezy application of show tunes or popular melodies – from opera to pop – to the words of the prayer book. Instead, Srul advocated music that married the mood to the words and resulted in something sophisticated, majestic and even magical. In the words of the Yuval Award Srul received from the Cantor's Assembly in 2000, Srul gave us "music that touched the soul."

And when it came to life, I have learned, Srul was correct again. The more expectations a person has in life – whether about career, success, marriage or children – the greater the chance of being disappointed if those expectations go unmet. Given the unpredictability of life and the many unreasonable expectations people come to embrace, the likelihood is that they will go unmet. The only way to escape the inevitable disappointment and consequent unhappiness is to shed expectations. This does not preclude being ambitious. Srul's life was a testament to what can be achieved by those who are skilful and determined. And in the end, every good that is enjoyed is an unanticipated blessing.

Ten years have passed since Srul ceded his earthly choir for a heavenly one. I miss my friend and teacher very much.

Holy Blossom Temple presents the Srul Irving Glick Memorial Concert on April 22 at 8 p.m. The concert features the Holy Blossom Temple Choir and Singers, the Lachan Jewish Chamber and Beth Tikvah choirs, and cantors Benjamin Maissner, Tibor Kovari and Efraim Sapir. Beth Tikvah Synagogue presents a memorial concert featuring works by Srul Irving Glick on June 7 at 8 p.m. Featured artists will be violinist Moshe Hammer, harpist Judy Loman, pianist Valerie Tryon, clarinettist Anthony Thompson and a 14-piece orchestra. Tickets are $36 and can be purchased in advance by calling 416-221-3433.

Rabbi Wayne Allen is the immediate past senior rabbi of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto and currently serves as the provost of the Canadian Yeshiva and Rabbinical School.

Passover app-ticipation

Passover is on the way, but its iPhone and iPad apps are already here. You can learn about the holiday, brush up on the haggadah – and even keep the kids occupied while you try to get some cleaning done. Apps are free unless otherwise noted.

Passover Preparation

No Chametz – Sell, Search, Destroy: Learn the laws for ridding your home of leavened products – including how to search for chametz on the night before Passover and burn it the following morning. [http://bit.ly/appesach1]

Pesach Guide: An overview of holiday customs, stories and essays with Chabad commentaries. [http://bit.ly/appesach2]

Passover Food Street, $.99: Holiday recipes including Borscht Sorrel Soup, Classic Apple Charoset, Chipotle Orange Chicken and Low Carb Lemon Mousse. A convenient app, but you can save yourself the $.99 and search for those recipes online. [http://bit.ly/appesach3]

Games and Stories

Mash Passover: A holiday variation of "Mad Libs," in which you fill in the blanks with names, songs, gifts and matzah-ball types to generate a zany story that predicts who will find the afikoman. [http://bit.ly/appesach8]

Passover – The Journey to Freedom Story: Illustrated children's storybook that will read the text to you. Or switch off the narration and have your kids do it themselves. [http://bit.ly/appesach13]

iMahNishtanah, $.99: Learn all the words of Mah Nishtanah through flash cards. Play a game to make sure your children understand what they mean. Then listen to the Four Questions and have them record their own version. [http://bit.ly/appesach11]

Passover Trucks Game $.99: Hurry! Various kinds of food (fruit, donuts, milk, matzah) are rolling down the conveyor belt. Your mission: to load the food onto the appropriate transport trucks (Regular or Passover). [http://bit.ly/appesach12]

Passover Matzah Ball Builder $.99: Imagine a digital Mr. Potato Head but swap the potato with a matzah ball. Decorate with a crazy assembly of appendages. When done, mail your personalized Matzah Ball to your computer and print. [http://bit.ly/appesach9]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Happy Matza $.99: Transform your iPad into a fairly realistic-looking piece of matzah. Use your fingers to coat it with (virtual) chocolate or jelly. Blow the mic to take a bite. Shake and start over. [http://bit.ly/appesach10]

Haggadot

Although these haggadot will help you prepare for the holiday, I am not recommending that the seder table becomes transformed into yet another high-tech venue. I'll be reaching for my well-thumbed, wine-stained, paper-based haggadah.

Haggadah for Passover $.99: Haggadah highlights in English, Hebrew and transliterated Hebrew. [http://bit.ly/appesach5]

The Union Haggadah $3.99: Edited by the Central Conference of American Rabbis with commentary and the haggadah text. (Oddly, the title page depicts a menorah, dreidel and Chanukah gelt!) [http://bit.ly/appesach6]

A Cantor's Seder $6.99: A bilingual haggadah, very nicely rendered with instructions and lovely singing by Cantor Emanuel Perlman of Chizuk Amuno Congregation in Baltimore. This app focuses on the songs and does not contain the entire text of the traditional Haggadah. [http://bit.ly/appesach7]

And Finally…

The ten Plagues of Egypt iPhone Apps [http://bit.ly/appesach14]: Not an app but a retelling of the story of the plagues if Moses had access to apps to help save the day, at least according to the students of the College of Management Academic Studies in Rishon LeZion.

Reconstructing beginning-of-life rituals

For months leading up to our child's birth, I imagined her first moments. What would I feel? How would I react? What would I say? I ran through the scene in my mind countless times, I read others' accounts of that first instant, and I turned to the brachah: "Blessed are You God, our Lord, King of the universe, who is Good and causes good." During the weeks before her birth, I practised that line over and over, memorizing its sound and feel.

But when the moment came, I was silent. There are few moments that leave you speechless. The paralysis was not induced by shock or surprise, a lack of clear thought or a dearth of strong emotion, but by awe.

On TV, babies are born crying. In reality, there is a moment of silence before the baby finds her voice. There is nothing more pristine, more pure than that moment. It is a kol demama daka. Usually translated as "a still, small voice," kol demama daka often refers to the Shofar blast. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks offers a variant translation, "A voice that you can hear only if you are listening." Listening closely, the silence was filled by our child's still, small, silent voice. A few moments later, shaken back into the world with the wail of our baby's cry (and after my wife reminded me), we responded to her with the brachah.

Liturgy helps me put words to feelings I'm unequipped to articulate. This is as true in the apex of Yom Kippur as it was during the first moment of our child's life. And so, when we wanted to welcome her into our community, we looked to liturgy.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Without knowing if we were having a boy or girl, we planned for both – for a boy a brit milah and for a girl an equally joyous ceremony rooted in tradition.

For a boy, there's a strong framework of text and ritual. While the structure is helpful, it's sometimes conducted as a perfunctory task. To make the brit milah a meaningful ceremony welcoming the baby into the community and ushering the parents into a new phase of life, we must frame the liturgy with personalization.

For a girl, there's no standardized liturgy, yet. We started the overwhelming task of piecing together texts and ritual, but unlike the brit, the ceremony had little connection to the millennia of Jewish women born before her. A ceremony meant to connect our daughter to the community seemed isolating in its forced uniqueness. The gender imbalance is striking, but the imbalance in structured standardization versus personal meaning in both ceremonies needs to be addressed.

When we welcomed our baby girl into our community a few weeks ago, we chose to follow a Sephardi custom, the Zeved Habat, seconded by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks in the Koren Sacks siddur. The siddur offers a framework for a standardized text, which we embellished with personal blessings and traditions. Beginning-of-life rituals offer a profound opportunity for the child, parents and community. Mixing celebration, text, and ritual, it's time to ensure that both girls and boys are welcomed with the liturgy and personal meaning they deserve.

'Israel Loves Iran' goes viral

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c.com

TEL AVIV — "Israel Loves Iran" may be the most unlikely title for a social networking campaign yet.

Whether in spite of its outlandishness or because of it, however, the movement has picked up an extraordinary amount of momentum in the short time since a Tel Aviv father and teacher, Ronny Edry, launched it on a whim with this opening salvo posted on Facebook in English: "To all the fathers, mothers, children, brothers and sisters: for there to be a war between us, first we must be afraid of each other, we must hate. I'm not afraid of you, I don't hate you, I don't even know you.

"I'm not an official representative of my country. I'm a father and a teacher. I know the streets of my town, I talk with my neighbours, my family, my students, my friends, and in the name of all these people... we love you. We mean you no harm. On the contrary, we want to meet, have some coffee and talk about sports."

This message accompanied two photo posters showing Edry and his wife and children alongside the words, "Iranians, we will never bomb your country, we [heart] you." Produced by graphic arts students at Pushpin Mechina, the posters have since been co-opted as a template for others to add their faces to the page. Within 48 hours, Edry began receiving messages from Iranians, some of whom even wanted to "friend" him on Facebook. "We also love you. Your words are reaching us despite the censorship," wrote one of them, according to a report in the Israeli newspaper Haaretz.

This poster was one of two that launched the campaign.

"The Iranian people, apart from the regime, do not hold a grudge nor animosity against anyone, especially not the Israelis... We never saw Israelis as our enemies... the regime cannot gain public support for war."

Another message called the Iranian leader "nothing more than an opportunist, and more than anything, an idiot. Everyone hates him. We love you, love peace. And thanks for your message."

Responses are rolling in from regular folks in a variety of countries, and even from some celebrities, including Pulitzer Prize-winning American author Alice Walker, who called Israel Loves Iran a "wonderful website."

On March 21, as Facebook tallied 7,399 "likes" for the page, an Israeli added this to the dialogue: "My name is Shmulik and I'm from Israel. I just want to tell you guys that the Israel citizens don't want to fight with you or anyone. We just want quiet and peace because we deserve that like everyone in this world. Let's stop together with all the hate. Let's stop with all the bad and negative propaganda. Let's create a better place to live."

To be sure, the idea that a Facebook dialogue can defuse the looming spectre of war seems far-fetched and possibly even ill-considered to many in Israel and abroad, who feel Edry's people-to-people approach fails to acknowledge that a military threat may be the only way to deflect a serious danger to Israel's existence.

But Edry is encouraged by the people power of his campaign. Here is his latest Facebook post: "Today we received and share[d] so many messages, from Iran and Israel of course, but also from the U.S., Germany, France, Italy, the U.K., Australia, Egypt, Lebanon, Sweden, Denmark, Bosnia, Monaco. Our message was broadcast in all these countries... We are reaching the heart of the world. I'm going to sleep tonight with a big smile on my face and I thank you for that."

How women saved our people

On Pesach, we recall the bondage of Israel in Egypt and the subsequent miraculous Exodus. We celebrate our survival and emergence as a people that had grown in number and strength, ready to serve God.

The Talmud demonstrates a correlation between the perseverance of our people, notably the women, and our departure from Egypt (Sotah, 11b): "Rav Avira expounded: In the merit of the righteous women who lived in that generation, Israel was delivered from Egypt. When they [the women] went to draw water, the Holy One, Blessed is He, would prepare fish for them in their jugs. And when they would draw them up, they would be half full of water and half full of fish. They would come and place two pots on top of the oven, one full of hot water and one full of the fish which they carried to their husbands in the field, and they would bathe and anoint their husbands, feed and give them drink, and have marital relations with them between the borders of the fields."

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Concerned that our people would soon dominate the Egyptians, Pharaoh devised a scheme to ensure the Egyptian people would retain supremacy over the descendants of Jacob living in his land. The people were to be enslaved – broken in mind and spirit. They worked long hours, meaning a decline in the birthrate – as well as strength and resolve – would be inevitable.

The women of Israel, however, had a different plan in mind.

Drawing water, the Iyun Yaakov (1661-1773) notes, was a difficult task traditionally performed by men. The women, however, with the help of God, gave, as our Gemara recounts, food and water to their husbands through one act. Furthermore, by going out into the fields, the women made it possible to preserve the intimacy – and maintain the numbers – of the Jewish people.

The women, recognizing that their people's existence was in peril, took action to ensure that not only would the nation continue to exist, but that it would thrive. Without the valiant efforts of our women in Egypt, God's enterprise – a Jewish nation –would have met an early demise. Our survival depended – and still depends – on strength of both spirit and numbers. Devotion – to God, one's people, one's family, one's spouse – is essential to our survival, and there's no finer example of this understanding than the actions of the Jewish women in Egypt.

The Pesach traditions developed in Sephardi countries, be they songs, food, or the Mimouna, are ways by which we express our devotion to HaShem and to our fellow Jews. Our long history supports the idea that these customs are critical to our maintaining our identity. This year, when we sit down to the Pesach seder, recalling our enslavement and redemption, we would do well to contemplate the actions of our righteous women in Egypt in light of today's challenges.

'Israel Truth Week' organized in London

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Civil rights activist Mark Vandermaas, organizer of a one-day London, Ont.-based conference meant to counter Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) events, wants Canadians to know the truth.

"We have to understand that the average person in Canada couldn't find Israel on a map, never mind understand all the intricacies and myths that are being [spread] by the IAW crowd. They're lying to you," said Vandermaas, who served in a United Nations peacekeeping force in the Middle East in 1978.

Vandermaas said his motivation to organize this event, called Israel Truth Week and held March 21 at the London Royal View Church, stemmed from a lesson he learned as a child.

"My parents lived under Nazi occupation in Holland, and they saw Jews taken away. They were not Jews themselves, but my father escaped from a Nazi war camp," he said.

"I grew up with an interest in the period and learned a lot about the Holocaust."

He said his research into the Holocaust taught him that it's important to speak out against injustice when the warning signs are present – especially when it doesn't affect you directly.

"In this world today, we can see grave dangers facing Jewish people. When the despots and the monsters of the world start coming for Jewish people, I'm not [safe]," he said.

Vandermaas publicly entered the Israeli-Palestinian debate last year after being an outspoken critic of the handling of protests that erupted in Caledonia, Ont., in 2006, when aboriginals demonstrated for nearly a year against a construction site they said was on native land.

He said he discovered that a London mosque had hosted a fundraising dinner to support a Canadian boat, called the Tahrir, that intended to breach the Israeli naval blockade on Gaza last July.

"I don't care whether it is a mosque or a United Church, but when a religious insitution is helping to raise money and support a project which, if successful, will enable more Jews to get killed and more Palestinians to die when Israel has to defend itself against war crimes, that's immoral," he said.

He said he spent an hour a day for 26 days standing outside the mosque, donning his UN blue beret, holding a sign that said Israel was created in part by a UN resolution that passed in 1947, and that the Hamas charter was condemned by the UN Human Rights Commission in 2006.

"When the vigil was over, I still wanted to do something to counter Israeli Apartheid Week, but I wasn't sure how to do it," he said.

When Vandermaas learned about a group of Jewish student at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) whose event that celebrated Israeli culture was shut down by anti-Israel protesters in February, he was galvanized into action.

"There was no way that these Jewish students should feel abandoned. I wanted to let them know they're not alone, and there were people who were watching," he said.

Vandermaas added that he was further motivated by a video he saw of UWO professor David Heap, who was aboard the Tahrir last summer.

Vandermaas said that when Heap was asked how he responds to the argument that Israel must defend itself against missiles from Gaza, Heap said that argument deflects attention from the real issue.

"That made me so angry because what that statement means... is that they deny the existence of the victims. When you do that, you deny the humanity of the victims," Vandermaas said.

Israel Truth Week organizer and civil rights activist Mark Vandermaas

His conference, which featured talks from such people as UWO political science professor Salim Mansur and Massachussetts-based Rabbi Jonathan Hausman, who was the keynote speaker, was meant to demystify the conflict.

"We're making the debate too complicated," Vandermaas said, adding that the basis of the Middle East conflict is antisemitism.

"We need to stop pretending that giving more land, surrendering land is going to bring peace to the Middle East... history has shown that it won't bring peace ever."

Vandermaas said he finds the oft-used argument that Israel is in violation of numerous UN resolutions to be ironic.

"It's interesting to me that pro-Palestinians seek legitimacy from the same organization that created Israel, but yet, deny [Israel's] legitimacy. It's hypocricy in the extreme," he said.

"If you won't even acknowledge that the United Nations voted to create a two-state solution in 1947 and the fact that Israel was attacked after declaring a state, I don't think I can go any further. That's the end of the discussion."

Winnipeg church hosts Dachau exhibit

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Nearly 100 people gathered in a historic Winnipeg church recently for the opening of an exhibition about the Dachau concentration camp.

The travelling exhibit Names Instead of Numbers, stories of former inmates – both Jewish and non-Jewish – of Dachau, is on display at Westminster United Church until April 14.

The 119-year-old Westminster United is the first Canadian church to house the exhibit. The exhibit grew out of the Dachau Remembrance Book project, which began in 1999, and was first displayed at the Protestant Church of Reconciliation at the Dachau site.

Names Instead of Numbers consists of 27 panels, including a history of Dachau and the Holocaust and biographies of 22 former Dachau inmates. Among them are Dutch, French and Austrian Resistance fighters, a Roma, German, Austrian and Polish Jews, eastern Europeans and anti-Nazi clergy, the best known of whom is Lutheran Pastor Martin Niemoller. One of the people whose story is told is that of Rabbi Emeritus Erwin Schild of Toronto's Adath Israel Congregation.

Rev. Robert Campbell, with Belle Millo, chair of Freeman Family Foundation Holocaust Education Centre, holds a copy of Millo's book, Voices of Winnipeg Holocaust Survivors.

"Dachau was Nazi Germany's first concentration camp," said Belle Millo, chair of Winnipeg's Freeman Family Foundation Holocaust Education Centre, at the exhibit's opening. "The camp was at first used to hold political prisoners. After Kristallnacht, a large number of Jewish prisoners were taken to Dachau. They were later joined by Seventh Day Adventists, Roma and common criminals."

Millo, whose father, the late Samuel Jarniewski, was a survivor of Dachau, is responsible for bringing the exhibit to Winnipeg. The Protestant Church of Reconciliation contacted her after the release of her book, Voices of Winnipeg Holocaust Survivors, two years ago.

Millo contacted Rev. James Christie, a professor in the theology department at the University of Winnipeg and director of the university's Ridd Institute for Religion and Global Policy, who is known as a friend of the Winnipeg Jewish community. Then Rev. Christie put her in touch with Rev. Robert Campbell of Westminster United.

"We saw this project as a wonderful opportunity to bring our two faiths together," Rev. Campbell told the audience at the opening. "We hope that as viewers study the panels in the display and the stories they tell, the viewers will be encouraged as citizens to be vigilant in the defence of freedom and the pursuit of justice."

Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz praised Millo for her efforts to raise awareness of the Holocaust and keep the memory alive. His own parents, he noted, were survivors of the Buchenwald camp.

"Every year around this time, there are new names entered into the Dachau Remembrance Book," Millo said. "The Nazis tried not only to murder all the Jews of Europe, but also to erase their names and their memory. In the camps, they became numbers. This exhibition restores the names of some of the victims and rescues their memory."

The Names Instead of Numbers exhibit is sponsored by Westminster United Church, the Ridd Institute and the Freeman Family Foundation.

Edmonton Talmud Torah to celebrate 100 years

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

When it opened its doors in a synagogue basement in 1912, Edmonton Talmud Torah became the first Jewish day school in Canada. As it prepares to celebrate its 100th birthday, the school is gathering stories and memories from its 2,000 alumni who now live all over the world.

"All of us were moulded and shaped by our experience at TT," says David Weisz, president of the Talmud Torah Society. "We're so excited to bring everyone together to reminisce, celebrate our school's longevity and talk about the future of Jewish education in Edmonton."

The celebrations will occur May 17 through 20, starting with a concert at the Royal Alberta Museum and culminating with a gala dinner on May 20 at the Westin. In between, there will be a welcoming reception at the Art Gallery of Alberta, a communal Shabbat during which old friends will be able to reconnect, tours of the old Talmud Torah School, in the city's Glenora neighbourhood, and an open house at the current school featuring students' art and performances.

Today, the school has 140 students ranging from kindergarten to Grade 9. It's a community Jewish day school and for the past 30 years has been an "alternative school" in the Edmonton Public School Board, which means it is funded like other public schools in the system, Weisz explains. "We provide secular instruction like other public schools in Edmonton for 60 per cent of the day and the rest of the day consists of a strong Judaic and Hebrew-language curriculum with content determined by the Talmud Torah Society."

After graduating from high school, he found his way to Toronto and started a family, enrolling his children at the Toronto Heschel School. "At around $10,000 per year per student, the cost of Jewish education in Ontario is prohibitive for many middle-class families," he says. "With my third child entering the system, I was wondering how I was going to afford Jewish education and still pay the mortgage."

A job opportunity returned him to his hometown, where tuition costs $4,500 per student to cover the Hebrew and Judaic portion of the program. "Edmonton Talmud Torah is a very unique public-private school hybrid model," he says. "The Edmonton Public School Board recognized that the public school system can and should contain specialized schools, including schools where religious observance is part of the program."

While ETT grew fast in its early years, with 52 children enrolled by 1915 and 250 kids enrolled in the 1990s, enrolment numbers have dropped since then, increasing slightly only recently with an influx of young Jewish families into the city. "They're drawn by our burgeoning economy and demand for highly paid professionals in medicine, research, IT, utilities, government and oil and gas industry," Weisz says.

Jay Palter and his family are among them, moving to Edmonton from Ontario in 2009 and enrolling his children in ETT. "This has been a great place for our family," Palter says. "Coming from the east, it was an excellent community for us to get involved in and that helped our transition a lot."

As it moves past its 100th birthday, the school is planning to double the size of its daycare/preschool as well as the size of classes going into kindergarten. "We currently have a waiting list in our preschool daycare, so the demand is there," says Weisz. "We are also implementing a digital learning pilot for our junior high students where they will have mobile devices and a wireless network at the school in order to use Google apps and other software as part of their learning."

Maintaining quality Jewish education in a city with a population of one million – Jews constitute 5,000 – is challenging, Weisz adds. "We're far from major Jewish population centres and don't have the breadth and depth of Judaic teaching resources that larger centres can draw upon. But we do have strengths. Our community has always supported Talmud Torah and millions of dollars were raised in the mid-1990s to buy the land and build the beautiful building we're in today. Parents and grandparents are always volunteering their time to help in the classroom or on school projects.

"We've also benefited greatly from the parents who have recently arrived from Israel, FSU [former Soviet Union] and Latin America who bring their energy and talents to the school," says Weisz.

Carleton grad students pass divestment motion

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Graduate students at Carleton University voted in favour last week of ending investments in companies with connections to Israel in what may be the first time such a divestment motion has been passed in a student-wide election at a Canadian university.

According to unofficial results, which need to be ratified by the Graduate Students' Association (GSA) council next month, 72 per cent of students voted in favour of a non-binding plebiscite question that asked if they believe Carleton should adopt a socially responsible investment policy, which would require the university to stop investing in companies "complicit in illegal military occupations and other violations of international law, including but not limited to: BAE Systems, Motorola, Northrop-Grumman, and Tesco Supermarkets."

The motion – put forward by graduate students who support the Carleton chapter of the group Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) – didn't mention Israel by name, but the first three firms have contracts with Israel's military, while Tesco, a British grocery chain, stocks products made in West Bank communities.

Carleton invests in the companies as part of its pension fund.

The March 21-22 election had an eight per cent voter turnout, which led some to question the plebiscite results.

There were 204 votes in favour of the motion and 77 opposed. According to its website, the GSA represents some 3,000 full- and part-time graduate students.

Yaelle Gang, media and communications executive at Carleton's chapter of the Israel Awareness Committee (IAC), said she doesn't believe the vote represents the views of all graduate students.

"It was a certain group of people who turned out to vote, and they had their certain agenda and it passed," she said. "It's obviously problematic, but the university has been very clear they don't have the intention of divesting from those companies."

But Kelly Black, graduate student representative-elect and current vice-president of operations for the GSA, said all students were made aware of the questions being asked, and they all had the opportunity to vote.

Additionally, he said, the vote was a plebiscite, not a referendum, meaning it aimed to gauge student opinion and was not a vote on a binding action.

Zane Colt, undergraduate student representative-elect to Carleton's board of governors, said he opposed the wording of the question.

"It only promotes hate and really tries to gang up and demonize Israel, which the board of governors won't tolerate, because they recognize it won't promote dialogue," he said.

But Black said the question did create the opportunity for dialogue. As per election policy, students could register official "yes" and "no" committees on the plebiscite question, but in this case, Black said only the yes side registered.

Gang said most of the IAC's members are undergraduate students, and there wasn't a voice on the GSA council advocating for the pro-Israel side.

In contrast, when SAIA tried to get the same question on the ballot for this year's undergraduate students' association election, the undergraduate council voted in favour of amending the question to make it broader, removing the part that mentioned the four companies that deal with Israel, Colt said.

SAIA then withdrew the motion, saying the amended wording changed its spirit.

Colt, who is also a former communications chair of the IAC, said he believes the GSA election results mean very little.

In order for the university to divest, the students would have to bring the issue to Carleton's board of governors, which in the past has rejected such motions.

Last year, hundreds of anti-Israel students protested at a board meeting, which led to a controversial cancellation of the meeting and a closed-door discussion that concluded with the decision the university would not divest from companies that do business in Israel.

At the time, Duncan Watt, Carleton's vice-president of finance and administration, said the university already considers environmental, social, and governance factors in its investment decisions.

Black said despite the board of governors' past actions in refusing to consider divestment, he will take on the role of advocating for it.

"I think this is clearly a thing at least graduate students have been asking for, for quite some time," he said, adding that the GSA has passed motions showing its support for divestment in the past.

"Hopefully I can raise the issue and bring the plebiscite as an example of what the students are asking for."

In response to last week's GSA vote, the administration said in a statement that Carleton's "board adopted a responsible investing policy last year. This policy is based on the United Nations principles of responsible investing and is considered to be best practice. This policy has been incorporated into the statement of investment policies and procedures for the pension plan. No changes to the policy are contemplated at this time."

גידי קורן וחברים

בואו לחגוג את בית החולים מאיר

"נרתמתי לעזור לבית החולים מאיר מתוך קשר אישי קרוב למנהלו הקודם, אומר רייף- מדהים אותי איך הם מצליחים לעשות כל כך הרבה למרות דלות האמצעים שעומדים לרשותם ומתקנים ישנים שזקוקים לחידוש דחוף". רייף, ידיד קרוב של הנשיא שמעון פרס, הוא גם מקימו של סניף טורונטו של מרכז פרס לשלום.

מה יהיה

הסיסמא "העולם שייך לצעירים" נראית פתאום תלושה ודימיונית. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Lawyer was 'genuinely committed' to human rights

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Gerald Lorne Gall – local, national and international human rights advocate, University of Alberta law professor, and a CJN columnist from 2005 to 2010 – died March 18. He was 65, and had experienced serious health issues for the past year

A native of Toronto who received his BA from Queen's University and his LLB from the University of Windsor, Gall moved to Edmonton with his wife, Karen, 38 years ago to begin teaching at the law school there. They had been married the previous year on March 19 – ironically, the date of his funeral.

Among the honours listed on Gall's 38-page CV, he was appointed an Officer of the Order of Canada in 2001. In 1995, he was awarded the Alberta Human Rights Award, and in 2010, he received a Distinguished Service Award for Service in Legal Scholarship from the Law Society of Alberta and the Canadian Bar Association.

Gerald Gall

A key organizer of the 1998 International Conference on Universal Rights and Human Values and a founder of the John Humphrey Centre for Peace and Human Rights, Gall was the organization's president at the time of his death. The centre has set up a memorial fund in his honour.

Karen Gall told The CJN in an e-mail that her husband's Jewish values "guided his passion for equality, human rights and justice."

Their daughter, Wendy, said in a eulogy that her father would say, "'If it's a human rights issue, it's a Jewish issue,' meaning that a person could not ignore an injustice just because it didn't affect them."

Her brother, Andrew, also in a eulogy, recalled their father's playful side at home and spoke of his teaching style at the university. He called him a "committed educator" who lectured without notes or props and believed that lawyers needed strong language skills and an understanding of current events to be professional and effective.

Gall's book, The Canadian Legal System, was "an innovative text" that explained Canadian law in an accessible way, Andrew said.

Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Abella said, "Professionally, Gerry was genuinely and unwaveringly committed to the protection of human rights. Personally, he was a warm, wonderful and generous mensch".

Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, recalls Gall as "a man of great sincerity [who] had tremendous integrity, and it was really his fidelity to justice that singled him out as a special person."

Farber had a long association with Gall, who served as CJC's Edmonton representative and chair of its law and social action committee in the mid-1980s. "He was an eminently fair man who you could go to at any time, and you would get a fair hearing and very wise counsel," Farber said.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, a former co-president of CJC, told The CJN in an e-mail that Gall "was a dedicated Jew. He was smart and humble. He always was full of great advice, but he was a gentleman who offered advice, and never imposed it. He was a pleasure to work with."

Gall is survived by his wife Karen; children Melanie, Wendy, and Andrew; and sisters Phyllis Elfan and Carole Robertson, both of Toronto.

Allan Raymond worked to preserve community's legacy

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Allan Raymond was the type of fellow who might have loved to attend his own funeral.

He died March 9 at age 90, and as those who knew him attested, he would have made it a point to take note of everyone who was present and to exchange a friendly word or two, as was his style.

Prior to the funeral service, they spoke of how he considered the historical importance of every event he attended and picked up virtually every piece of material related to it: flyers, photographs, signatures and any other ephemera.

Those events included many a funeral.

To Raymond, it was all important, and vital to preserving the rich historical legacy of Quebec's Jewish community.

Raymond, they said, although a historian only by avocation, played a singular role in preserving that legacy.

For decades, he was a ubiquitous, endearingly quirky figure who showed up in a trademark hat at almost every community event, at every Jewish estate and garage sale, or at any other happening where there was a possibility of collecting another artifact.

"It was simple: he had a passionate love for Canadian-Jewish history," said Ron Finegold, a former director of the Jewish Public Library (JPL), where some 60 boxes of the Allan Raymond Collection are in the archives awaiting scrutiny.

About a decade ago, Raymond donated to the JPL thousands of images he had taken or collected over the years, many of them "incredible," said JPL archivist Shannon Hodge.

A proud veteran of World War II – Jewish war vets stood in formation at his funeral – Raymond became a successful insurance broker and started "collecting Jewish history" in 1953 while researching a McGill University paper on the roots of Montreal Jewry.

Over the decades, Raymond was a frequent community lecturer and was very involved with the now-defunct Jewish Historical Society of Montreal, as well as the Westmount Historical Association, St. James Literary Society, Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, Congregation Shaar Hashomayim and other institutions. At the funeral service at Paperman and Sons, attended by about 75 people, Raymond's son Gary and nephew Neil described Raymond's "boundless energy," his generosity of spirit and his qualities as a "lovely, wonderful human being."

Raymond is survived by his wife, Bess, children, Glenda and Gary, and brother, James.

I stand with Israel

Earlier this month, I attended the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) Policy Conference in Washington, D.C.

As a member of the six-person delegation from the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), meeting and sharing the experience with the other delegates from Canada was unforgettable.

AIPAC is America's pro-Israel lobbying organization, and in fact one of the largest lobbying committees in the United States. Its mission is to strengthen U.S.-Israel ties, and it works to conceive and implement policies that enhance the two nations' vital relationship.

Given the latest news in Middle Eastern affairs, namely, allegations surrounding Iran's development of nuclear weapons, the AIPAC conference arrived at a critical time.

One of the most enlightening aspects of the conference was being exposed to an immense pro-Israel community that is not Jewish.

Growing up in a predominantly Jewish community and attending day school up to university, I never even entertained the idea that non-Jews could be as passionate about the State of Israel as I am.

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

I assumed that given the lack of a Jewish heritage and history, they could not possibly feel the connection I inherently possess. I was wrong.

Despite my preconceived notions, many delegates and even political figures who spoke at the conference, such as U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, who are not Jewish, work hard to strengthen the U.S.-Israel relationship.

This reaffirmed to me that religion should not be a barrier that prevents people from supporting Israel. Aside from Israel's status as a Jewish state, it requires our support as a sovereign entity, irrespective of religion.

Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East and that renders its security essential to any western nation. President Barack Obama, one of the several leading speakers at the conference, said it best, "There will be no lasting peace until Israel's security concerns are met."

For the vast global village that seeks peace in the Middle East, it is only natural to support Israel, given many countries' contemporary outlook of taking any action or pursuing any interest that could result in securing universal harmony.

Moreover, Israel is the only state in the Middle East that currently recognizes 15 different religions, giving its citizens complete freedom of religion. Thus Christians, Muslims, Jews and others are free to practise their faiths in whatever capacity they desire.

Furthermore, women in Israel exercise equal rights to men, can dress how they like, obtain a comprehensive education and participate in the community. Israel was the third country in the world to elect a female leader when Golda Meir became the prime minister in 1969.

These are some of the shared values that compel us to stand with Israel.

Now, you may ask how a delegation of Canadian university students could benefit from a conference focused on the U.S.-Israel alliance.

Well, being in attendance among 13,000 pro-Israel advocates was itself exceptionally empowering. Given the volatile state of affairs in the region, the conference served as a warm cover of reassurance, as participants witnessed and took part in the vast gathering.

Moreover, the conference took place from March 3 to 6, during the same week as the annual Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) was held on campuses throughout North America. Although it was difficult to miss the beginning of IAW at my school, the University of Western Ontario, I felt my attendance at the conference was imperative.

It was in Washington that I realized the importance for Canada to mirror AIPAC's actions and institute a large-scale conference for Canadian pro-Israel advocates.

Arguably referred to as "Israel's best friend," it seems only natural and essential that Canada should host a conference to encourage and inspire its politicians and citizens to confirm Israel's very existence and security.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu addressed the AIPAC attendees, promising that "[he] will never let [his] people live in the shadow of annihilation."

By virtue of Israel's hostile neighbours and enemies, it is apparent that Netanyahu should not act alone in protecting and defending Israel.

Now more than ever, Israel needs our support to defend its right to survive and thrive. Present-day students are the future generation that can either perpetuate Middle Eastern conflicts and animosity or work to secure a lasting peace.

Jewish and non-Jewish pro-Israel young adults must continue to take this responsibility seriously by further educating themselves, staying informed about Middle Eastern affairs and advocating for Israel on their campuses and in their communities. It is crucial that we as young adults accept this challenge and continue to represent and properly dignify our indispensable Israel.

Researchers target genes that regulate lifespan

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c

RAMAT GAN — All the anti-aging potions, lotions and notions on the market and in development add up to a very pretty penny. Maybe some of them actually work. Yet the biology behind aging, and how to slow its effects, has never been well understood.

Now, seven years of Israeli researchers have revealed that it may all come down to a specific gene called Sirtuin 6, or SIRT6 for short. They described their study in the Feb. 22 online issue of the popular science journal Nature.

SIRT6 is one of seven sirtuin genes that encode a class of proteins found in every species from single-celled yeast to complex humans. For years, scientists had zeroed in on SIRT1. When they removed SIRT1 from yeast, worms and flies, these creatures aged faster and died sooner. When they transplanted a copy of SIRT1 into the three species instead, their life expectancy increased.

But yeast and flies aren't mammals. So molecular biologist Haim Cohen of Bar-Ilan University instead turned his attention to a 2006 study involving SIRT6, which showed that mice lacking this gene aged more quickly, developing spinal curvature, calcium deficiency, osteoporosis, immune system problems and diabetes – just like humans.

"People were mostly interested in SIRT1," Cohen said. "So I thought it might be better for us as a new lab to work on something that is less crowded."

His Bar-Ilan graduate student, Yariv Kanfi, spent more than five years breeding mice that would receive an extra dose of SIRT6. Most of the lab work was done in Bar-Ilan, the pathology at Hebrew University's Hadassah Medical School and the bioinformatics by Ziv Bar-Joseph, an Israeli professor at Pennsylvania's Carnegie Mellon University.

Cohen's hunch proved to be a good one. His team demonstrated that extra SIRT6 increased survival rates in their male laboratory mice by as much as 15 percent above normal.

They're not sure why it didn't have a similar effect on the female mice, but since females of this strain tend to live 15 per cent longer than males, the boost of SIRT6 may simply have allowed the guys to catch up with the girls.

"Females have different hormone levels that affect metabolism and lifespan," explains Shoshana Naiman, a doctoral student from Chicago who joined the study four years ago. "SIRT6 perhaps caused the males to be a little more like the females. I'm now heading the project on researching the gender difference and exactly how the lifespan extension occurs, so we can try to transfer it to humans."

Cohen tells Israel21c that the team also wants to determine which body tissues are most critical to longevity by injecting SIRT6 selectively rather than generally. In addition, they'll be searching for molecules that can mimic the results in mice.

"If we want to translate this to human therapy, we must find molecules that activate the protein. Once we have that, we can go to clinical trials," he says.

Even without yet understanding every piece of the puzzle, the results are quite significant, Naiman tells ISRAEL21c. "Nature is one of the top journals, and only one per cent of total submissions get accepted. This was the first from Bar-Ilan in about 30 years."

Women's group aims at renaissance in values

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Visiting Jerusalem is a highlight of Jewish Women's Renaissance Project trip to Israel.

These days, in the era of social media and the Internet, when things go viral, they really go viral.

Take the Jewish Women's Renaissance Project (JWRP) for instance. Four years ago, eight women led by Toronto native Lori Palatnik gathered at a resort in Utah to brainstorm ideas "to do something for the Jewish people around the world."

They came up with the idea of creating "a Jewish women's movement that inspires a renaissance of positive values that transforms ourselves, our families, and our communities."

The flagship activity adopted by the JWRP was a subsidized trip to Israel, a sort of "Birthright for women," Palatnik said, referring to the subsidized free trips to Israel for Jewish young people.

It was a big idea designed to address a really big issue, and word spread quickly. They told some friends, who told other friends, who used Facebook, e-mail and other social media to spread the concept. "It took off like a rocket," said Palatnik, founding director of JWRP.

In 2009, JWRP's first year of operation, 300 women participated in a nine-day visit to the Holy Land. In the second year, the numbers doubled to 600, and in 2010, JWRP took 1,000 women in five groups to Israel. Palatnik expects another 1,000 will make the trip this year, and in 2013, the number is expected to swell to 1,200. The 2,000 women who have taken part so far hail from seven countries, including Canada, the United States and Mexico.

The trips have been so exciting and enriching that demand far exceeds supply. At an information session in Los Angeles not long ago, 30 prior participants brought 200 friends with them, even though only 40 spots were available. Toronto women likewise have made the trip, often recruited through partnering groups at a number of Aish HaTorah-affiliated synagogues. Palatnik and her husband, Rabbi Yaakov Palatnik, founded Toronto's Village Shul, which is Orthodox, although she said the trip is geared to non-Orthodox women.

Lori Palatnik

Palatnik acknowledges that many women are enticed by the low cost of the trip. Participants are asked to pay only for airfare, while JWRP picks up the remaining $1,800-per-person tab. Subsidies are available through partnering groups, including synagogues, and some federations, but it's a small group of well-to-do supporters who provide the financial muscle that makes JWRP trips a possibility.

While cost is certainly a consideration, it's the nature of the trip itself that has proven the real enticement, Palatnik said. "It's well thought out." It balances visits to tourist destinations such as Jerusalem and the Dead Sea with a spiritual dimension. "We make it special and meaningful."

In Jerusalem, the women enjoy a Shabbat dinner with a view of the Kotel (Western Wall), while hosting one or more lone soldiers, those who have no family in Israel. The soldiers tell about their experiences, and the women get a chance to "mother" the young men and women, Palatnik said.

At Masada, participants enjoy a unique naming ceremony. "One-third don't have Jewish names, so they get [one] in a 2,000-year-old shul at the top of Masada. It's the oldest shul in the world.

"They dance, they cry, and every day is like that, special and meaningful," Palatnik added.

JWRP organizes speaking presentations that examine the Jewish contribution to civilization. Palatnik, herself an accomplished public speaker, discusses the application of the practical wisdom of the Torah to everyday issues such as raising children and ensuring a successful marriage.

In addition, there are fun activities such as camel riding, white water rafting and swimming in the Dead Sea.

"The women have the time of their lives. They laugh. They shop. They shop a lot." Merchants in places like the artist colony in Safed lick their lips in anticipation of their visit, Palatnik quipped.

"They have a ball," she added. "It's so much fun. It's like summer camp for moms."

Ann Weiszmann, a mother of two from Toronto, said, "It really has changed my life... For somebody who is open-minded and who wants to learn more about their heritage, this is a great way to do it."

Weiszmann learned about the trip through a friend. Although she had been to Israel to celebrate her older son's bar mitzvah, she saw the JWRP tour as a chance to get a different perspective on the country.

"This was my big opportunity. It really took me to see places I hadn't been to on our family trip."

On top of that, "the learning was really incredible."

Weiszmann was part of a group of 18 mostly "secular" women from Toronto on the July 2011 visit. From the first lecture on lashon hara (gossip), Weiszmann found the perspective offered to be enlightening.

"For me, the learning part of it was really integral. It exposed me to things I had not been exposed to," she said.

Since her return, she's continued her Jewish education by studying with Gail Michalowicz, the rebbetzin at the Westmount Shul. She now bakes challah for Shabbat and lights Shabbat candles, two mitzvot she adopted on her return.

"I'm 100 per cent recommending it to others," said Weiszmann, a geologist who is a senior policy adviser with Ontario's Ministry of Northern Development and Mines.

Weiszmann's response is exactly what the organizers say they are looking for. At the heart of the project are Jewish values and continuity.

"Jewish women create community," Palatnik said. "They set the spiritual tone of the home and they are the main deciders of the direction of the family: for example, the schools, the neighbours we socialize with, what camps the children will go to, how we support our husbands in the evenings.

"If you inspire a Jewish woman with Jewish values, then the decisions she will make are through a Jewish prism."

To increase the benefits of the trip, JWRP set some conditions: participants must have children at home under age 18, and they are ineligible if they observe the Sabbath. That would ensure the benefits are passed down to the next generation, while including women who are shomrei Shabbat would be like preaching to the choir. It's women who are unaffiliated that "are in danger of falling off the Jewish map," Palatnik said.

She said most of the participants are not affiliated with Jewish organizations. In addition, 63 per cent have no connections to their local federations.

So far, JWRP's internal research suggests the program is making a difference. Polling past participants in 2010, JWRP found:

- 86 per cent said being Jewish was now more important to them;
- 41.5 per cent subsequently put their children into Jewish youth groups;
- 43.2 per cent increased their volunteer activities within the Jewish community;
- 97 per cent had encouraged family and friends to visit Israel;.
- 76 per cent increased their attendance at Jewish services;
- 90.3 per cent increased their Jewish learning;
- 75.4 per cent increased their observance of Shabbat;
- 96 per cent said the trip had been a life-changing event.

Palatnik said the Utah 8 identified a big problem and agreed to avoid half-hearted measures. Its mandate was always to "think big."

She points with pride to what she considers the JWRP's most significant accomplishment: 25 per cent of participants had "pulled their children out of public schools and put them into [Jewish] day schools.

"That's a game changer," she said.

Pan pals offer their holiday favourites

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

I have a Facebook group where people love to share their favourite recipes and treasured food memories – it's called Norene's Kitchen! Sometimes people ask a cooking question or post a last-minute request for a recipe for tonight's dinner. Others want to know how to cook with an unfamiliar ingredient.

I communicate regularly with my Facebook "pan pals" online in Norene's Kitchen! I've even met many of them in person. They form a diverse group, with members from all over the world. I'm amazed at how technology has connected us, regardless of distance, age or gender, through our love of food. My motto is: "There's always room for one more in my virtual kitchen!"

I've asked some of my Facebook pan pals to share a treasured Passover recipe with you, my readers. Enjoy in good health!

I first "met" Gloria Kobrin of New York on Facebook where we quickly became virtual "friends." Last October, we met face-to-face in New Jersey at Kosherfest and we connected immediately, as if we had known each other forever.

Gloria has been married to her husband, Richard, for 40 years and they have two children and two grandchildren. She has cooked almost her entire life for groups ranging from four to 100 people. She is the author of the Kosher Cookbook App for the iPhone and iPod. Gloria shares her recipes and cooking tips on her Kosher Cookbook page on Facebook, her blog at www.koshercookbook.blogspot.com and on Twitter.com/Koshercookbook/. She's an active member of Norene's Kitchen! where she shares many of her wonderful recipes and her culinary knowledge.

Gloria wrote: "Strange as it may seem, when it comes to Passover, I prefer that the food I'm preparing should not be based on matzah – especially dessert! My Fudgy Flourless Chocolate Cake satisfies that requirement. It is rich, dense and fudgy, without a hint of flour or matzah meal, so it is gluten-free. This is a wonderful dessert for Passover and all year round."

GLORIA KOBRIN'S FUDGY FLOURLESS CHOCOLATE CAKE (Pareve)

This cake is for the real chocolate lovers amongst you. It is best when made one or two days in advance of serving it. This is a relatively flat, moist, dense cake that packs a lot of flavour.

7 ounces semi-sweet pareve chocolate
1/2 cup very strong coffee, divided use
1 cup non-dairy margarine, room temperature
1 cup sugar
4 eggs
fresh berries to garnish

Preheat oven to 350. Spray an 8-inch spring-form pan with nonstick spray. Wrap foil around the bottom one inch of the pan. Set aside.

Place chocolate and 1/4 cup coffee together in a microwave-safe bowl. Place in microwave and heat for 2-1/2 to 3 minutes or until you can stir the coffee and chocolate together and they are completely smooth. (You can also melt chocolate and coffee together in a double boiler.) Add remaining 1/4 cup coffee and stir again. Let chocolate cool for 5 minutes.

Beat margarine and sugar together in bowl of an electric mixer until light. Add eggs, one at a time, to margarine and sugar, beating well after each addition. Add chocolate mixture and beat again until all ingredients are well blended.

Pour into prepared pan and bake for 45 minutes. The top will rise and separate from the rest of the cake.

Remove cake from the oven and cool on rack. The top will fall after some time out of the oven.

When the cake has completely cooled, unsnap the spring form pan and push the bottom through the ring. (The cake is so moist that I don't even try to take it off the bottom of the pan!)

Put it on a beautiful serving platter and surround it with berries. Yield: 10 to 12 servings. Serve small slices as it is very rich.

Ruth Heiges of Elkins Park, Penn., and I correspond regularly but we have never met – yet! She lived in Israel for many years but decided to move back to the United States to be closer to her aging parents.

Ruth is looking forward to launching her new website, www.informedkosher.com right after Passover. This comprehensive website will "aggregate the most useful kosher resources of the web into one convenient collection, from kosher food delivery to recipes, all current cookbooks, and restaurants."

She chose to share her Passover sponge cake recipe, as it has special meaning for Ruth and her family. She wrote: "This recipe hearkens back to when I was in grade school and the measure used by all Jewish homemakers was a "glezel" (i.e., a yahrzeit glass, which evidently was equivalent to a cup). My mother, z'l, didn't have or need an electric mixer, because she had me there to whisk the whites by hand.

"For my family, having this sponge cake is not a tradition – it's an imperative."

RUTH HEIGES' PASSOVER SPONGE CAKE

10 eggs, separated
pinch of salt
1 cup sugar
grated zest of 1 orange
1/3 cup cake meal
1/2 cup potato starch
juice of 1 lemon

Cut a round of baking parchment or waxed paper to fit the bottom of a 10-inch tube pan. Preheat the oven to 350.

Add the pinch of salt to the whites. Beat the whites in a large mixing bowl until stiff peaks form. Then, gradually beat in the sugar (several tablespoons at a time). The rest should be folded in by hand.

Lightly beat the yolks with the orange zest and add to the whites. Fold carefully to combine.

Alternating, fold in the cake meal and potato starch (a few tablespoons at a time). About half-way through this process, add the lemon juice.

Pour into the ungreased tube pan. Bake at 350 for 45 to 50 minutes.

Remove from oven and invert pan until cooled. Yield: 12 servings.

Family food traditions continue

Notes:

Cake can also be baked in a 13 x 9 x 2-inch baking pan for about 30 minutes. Check to see that the top is golden brown and springs back when touched.

During baking, tread lightly and avoid opening the oven. This kind of cake can "fall." It often sinks somewhat during cooling.

Brina Sachs Gonzales loves to cook. She posts regularly on Facebook and her Shabbos menus are always amazing. On her blog www.mikoshercocina.wordpress.com, she explains her culinary philosophy about family meals and memories: "Many of my memories came from preparing food and around the dinner table. Now I let my kids look at food books and magazines and allow them to choose one dish for Shabbos. Food is the universal language. If you're not dining as a family, then there are no food memories to pass down."

Pesach preparations are very hectic for both Brina and her husband, Elazer, as he is the kosher food manager at a Cincinnati supermarket and works 13-hour days at this super-busy time of year. With four young children, Brina has learned how to pace herself and deal with the challenges.

Brina wrote, "We don't use processed foods at Pesach in our house – that's our minhag (custom), so we have to get creative. Our main ingredients are fruits, vegetables, meat, fish, eggs and potatoes – nothing else. My kids live for fruit smoothies for dessert. We eat so healthy at Passover that I always say that I'm going to continue when it's over, but I get so tired of peeling that the moment that Passover is over, I'm done!"

BRINA SACHS GONZALES' SWEET & SOUR MEATBALLS

1 ripe pineapple
1 large or 2 small onions
1 carrot
4 to 6 tomatoes
salt to taste
2 to 3 tbsp. oil (to taste)
3 to 4 lb. chopped meat

Peel all produce (pineapple, onions, carrot and tomatoes). Remove the core from the pineapple. Cut all produce into chunks. Purée in the food processor using the steel blade. Transfer mixture to a large pot. Add salt and oil and bring to a boil.

In the meantime, roll the meat into balls (no additives are needed). Place meatballs in sauce. Reduce heat, cover and simmer for 2 hours. Yield: 10 to 12 servings.

Faith Kramer cooks and writes about food in Oakland, Calif., but is a born and bred New Yorker. She serves up "deliciousness" on her delightful blog at www.clickblogappetit.com/, Cooking Local, Eating Global.

Faith sent me the original version of her matzah brei (below), although every time she makes it, she keeps refining it. Feel free to make your own variations. She makes a huge batch and reheats it on school mornings.

Faith says, "You'll have to make it and decide for yourself if this sweet brunch or dessert version of the classic Jewish Passover favourite is really the best in the world or just the best my kids have ever tasted. They claim it is the best and other relatives concur. My father-in-law has me make it for him even when it is not Passover. A cousin's son made his family travel from Los Angeles to my home in Oakland for Passover one year just so he could eat it.

FAITH KRAMER'S WORLD'S BEST CUSTARD MATZAH BRIE

"I admit this can be a very rich dish if you make it with whole milk, but you can cut some of the fat by using fat-free milk (which is what I usually do). You could also replace the eggs with egg substitute (which I don't)."

10 whole matzot
4 eggs, beaten
1/4 to 1/2 cup sugar (or more or less to taste)
2 cups of whole, low fat or fat-free milk
1 tsp. vanilla (kosher for Passover)
2 tsp. grated orange rind (optional)
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. ground cinnamon
grating (or dash) of nutmeg
1 tbsp. unsalted butter (or more as needed for the frying pan)
cinnamon sugar (optional)

Dip whole matzot into warm water until wet on both sides. Drain well and break into small pieces in a large bowl.

In another bowl, combine eggs, sugar, milk, vanilla, orange rind, salt, cinnamon and nutmeg and beat to mix well.

Pour over drained matzah and let sit for 10 minutes to allow matzah to absorb some of the custard mixture. Stir the mixture occasionally.

Heat butter in a very large frying pan over medium heat. Add matzah mixture and fry in butter, adding additional butter as needed. (If you have too much for one pan, cook in batches and keep cooked matzah brei warm in a 250-degree oven. Be sure the matzah brei has room to fry, not steam in the frying pan. If you will be holding the matzah brei for any time, slightly under cook it so it won't dry out.)

Let the matzah brei mixture set in the hot pan for a minute or two and begin to brown, then use your spatula to break it into chunks and turn it over. Keep turning and breaking up the matzah brei every one to two minutes for a few more times until the custard mixture is absorbed but the matzah is still moist and the outside of the mixture is browned and slightly crisp.

Sprinkle with cinnamon sugar, if desired. Serve with syrup, jam or other toppings. Yield: 4 to 6 servings.

More delicious food for youngsters

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

No doubt about it, Passover is a difficult time to feed kids, many of whom subsist on eight days of stomach-wrenching matzah. For my kids, the Pesach menu is matzah with jam, matzah with cheese and a few reluctant bites of fish and meat at my insistence. Like many parents anxious to ensure that kids have nutritious meals, I try to turn the other cheek during Passover and resolve to get them back on schedule as soon as the last matzah box has hit the recycling bin.

In an effort to do better this year, I asked a couple of kosher chefs for recipes and tips on the Passover feeding of smaller humans. "Stay away from almost all the fake stuff in boxes and mixes," cautions Susie Fishbein, author of the Kosher By Design series of cookbooks. She's referring to the just-add-water, ready-to-go mixes that are a pantry staple for many of us during Passover. "I'm talking about things that are completely fake, like mustard, soy sauce and pasta," she adds. "The flavours are so off, they're not worth working with."

Fishbein says Parmesan Quinoa was a huge hit with her kids last year, a recipe her daughter made for a dairy Passover meal. "We loved it so much, we started making it all year 'round," she says. "Quinoa is a seed, not a grain, and know what a great favour you are doing your body by eating it, as it contains all essential amino acids, something few meatless proteins contain." The Passover Popovers she served with strawberry butter were also a popular dish.

Toronto cookbook author Norene Gilletz is another woman with experience feeding fussy kids. She suggests a healthier version of ice cream for breakfast. "Combine yogurt with frozen chunks of banana and strawberries in the food processor to make an extra-thick smoothie," she says. Her go-to recipes for kids' Passover meals include Cheese Latkes, Soup Dumplings and Wacky Franks.

SUSIE FISHBEIN'S PARMESAN QUINOA

1 cup quinoa
2 cups water
1 tbsp. butter
1/4 tsp. fine sea salt
1/2 cup grated Parmesan cheese

Rinse quinoa in a medium bowl, covering with water, swishing it around and then draining it in a strainer.

Place drained quinoa in a medium pot, adding water, butter and salt. Bring to a boil, lower to a simmer and allow the quinoa to bubble and cook for 15 minutes until all the liquid is absorbed. The outer germ layer will separate and the grains will look shiny. Stir in the Parmesan. Serve warm or at room temperature.

SUSIE FISHBEIN'S PASSOVER POPOVERS

nonstick cooking spray
1 cup water
1/3 cup unsalted butter or margarine
1/2 cup matzah meal
1/2 cup matzah cake meal
1/2 tsp. fine sea salt
2 tbsp. sugar
6 large eggs

Preheat oven to 450. Grease the top and inside cups of a nonstick popover tin with cooking spray.

In a medium pot bring water and butter or margarine to a boil over medium heat. Add matzah meal, matzah cake meal, salt and sugar. Continue cooking, stirring until the batter no longer sticks to the sides of the pot.

Remove pot from stove and transfer dough to the bowl of an electric mixer. Beat at high speed for one minute, adding eggs one at a time and continuing to beat after each addition. Beat another 1-2 minutes, then transfer batter to a large measuring cup for easy pouring.

Divide batter among popover compartments and bake for 20 minutes. Without opening oven door, reduce heat to 325 and bake another 30 minutes or until puffed and golden. Remove from pan and serve with butter, honey or jam.

2/3 cup matzah meal
1/2 tsp salt
dash freshly ground black pepper

NORENE GILLETZ'S PASSOVER WACKY FRANKS

Hot dog and bun, all baked in one!

1/2 cup oil
1 cup water
2 cups matzah or cake meal
1 tbsp. sugar
1/2 to 1 tsp. salt (to taste)
4 eggs
12 hot dogs, frozen (beef, chicken or veal)
12 wooden skewers

Preheat oven to 375. Combine oil and water in saucepan and bring to a boil. Add matzah or cake meal, sugar and salt and mix well, until mixture pulls away from sides of pan. Transfer mixture into processor bowl.

Using the steel blade, process mixture for 5 seconds. Add eggs one at a time through feed tube while machine is running. Process 30 to 40 seconds longer, until smooth.

Mould mixture around frozen hot dogs, oiling hands slightly for easier handling. Place on sprayed foil-lined baking sheet. Bake for 50 minutes. Remove from oven and insert wooden skewers. Yield: 12 hot dogs.

Keeps 2 days in the refrigerator. Reheats and/or freezes well.

Brown on medium heat on both sides until golden. Repeat with remaining cheese mixture, adding more butter or oil to skillet as necessary. Yield: approx. 12 latkes.

Keeps 2-3 days in refrigerator. Reheats and freezes well.

The challenge: feeding your allergic child

Shayla Gunter-Goldstein
Special to The CJN

Having a toddler with multiple food allergies is challenging at the best of times. Since my son is allergic to nuts, eggs, fish and sesame, I am often at a loss to know what to feed him beyond the "regulars." I am thankful during the year for kosher chicken nuggets, soy nut butter, cream cheese and, of course, pasta.

But come Passover, it's another story. Mealtimes are frustrating and often confusing. However, I've learned – with the help of some excellent websites, vegan cookbooks, Internet allergy groups, and a little creativity – that there are options for my son, ones that the rest of the family will also enjoy!

The Kids with Food Allergies website (www.kidswithfoodallergies.org) – an informative resource from a dedicated group of parents – has a Passover resource guide that includes seder tips and recipes. It suggested our family's new practices of using an avocado pit on the seder plate instead of an egg, and serving mini-red potatoes in salt water. My son adored those! Find the resource at bit.ly/azjXXq.

For charoset, a traditional Ashkenazi recipe may be used, omitting the nuts. Adding raisins, or some crushed Passover O's breakfast cereal (that look like Cheerios) helps add crunchiness and texture. There's an extensive index of intriguing nut-free charoset recipes to be found at http://bit.ly/Glz3ch.

Dinners and lunches during Pesach tend to be simple in our house. We stick to cooked meats and fresh vegetables, matzah pizza or matzah lasagna, lots of cheese, cream cheese, jam – and matzah, of course. Give my son matzah and cream cheese, and he's a happy camper. Add nut-free, pareve chocolate spread, and he'll help with the housework! The brand in Toronto-area stores that is nut-free is Hashahar H'aole, from Israel. It is available year-round, and is a staple in our house, as a treat.

Since my children live on pasta, I've succumbed and bought a Passover version. We've found one that – if not overcooked – is not completely inedible with lots of cheese and some tomato sauce. An alternative to pasta, if your children will eat vegetables, is spaghetti squash, or zucchini ribbons. The latter is made by using a vegetable peeler and peeling ribbons of zucchini. Lightly sauté, and toss with sauce and cheese for a healthy supper. Vegetable pancakes are also another standby. We like carrot pancakes made with the recipe below.

Breakfast during Pesach is tricky. We can't have our egg-free waffles, so again, we eat matzah with all the toppings, plus yogurt. Omitting the nuts from a Passover granola recipe also makes a great breakfast cereal or a satisfying and crunchy snack for weekends. Recipes aplenty may be found on the Internet.

I make eggless pancakes every weekend during the year. Last year, I experimented with my recipe, and came up with a respectable Passover version. A bit chewier than regular ones, the kids nevertheless gobbled them up. My recipe is below. I've also learned that you get decent results from adding one cup of applesauce, one tablespoon of oil and three tablespoons of water or milk to one cup of Passover pancake mix. I may get lazy and try that this year, too.

Keep kids meals simple

Matzah brei isn't popular in our house, but there is a vegan recipe on the Internet, by Nava Atlas (http://www.vegkitchen.com/). It contains quinoa flakes, which I've yet to find in Toronto.

Passover wouldn't be Passover without homemade desserts. Chocolate-dipped fruit is always a winner. We love Norene Gilletz's Chocolate Blueberry Blobs (recipe below). A vegan baking practice is to substitute for eggs by using a variety of other liquids or binders. Commercial egg-replacer is cornstarch-based, thus kitniyot, and not allowed for Ashkenazim during Passover. Potato starch is a comparable alternative. For example, in cake recipes (from scratch or boxes), mixing 1 tablespoon of water with 1 tablespoon of potato starch and 1/4 tsp. kosher for Passover baking powder (if you use it in your home) per egg called for in the recipe works well. I find this works best with recipes calling for only 1 or 2 eggs. Another egg replacer product is ground flax. Flax is considered to be acceptable by some rabbis, but kitniyot by others. When in doubt, consult your local halachic authority.

Using bananas, applesauce and potato starch in Passover baking can yield some nice results. An added bonus is you get some fruit into your kids if they are picky eaters. My pancake recipe uses both. For flour substitutions, I like to use the recommendations by the Vegan Resource Group (www.vrg.org). One cup all purpose flour = 1/4 cup matzah cake meal and 3/4 cup potato starch; 1/2 cup all-purpose flour = 2 tbsp. matzah cake meal and 6 tbsp. potato starch.

Unfortunately, many Passover prepared products do not include allergy labelling, so it is wise to spend some time calling manufacturers to determine what's safe for your child and to gain some peace of mind.

Don't be afraid to experiment with traditional recipes if you have the time. While preparing allergy-friendly foods can be challenging during Passover, it will let your little ones experience the freedom that is the spirit of the holiday. Chag Samayach!

CARROT PANCAKES

From Vegan Passover Recipes: Eggless and Dairy-Free Dishes by Dr. Nancy Berkoff. Published by the Vegetarian Resource Group www.vrg.org. Used with permission. These pancakes are colourful, tasty and good for you.

1 1/2 lb. coarsely grated carrots
1/4 cup coarsely grated onion
2 tbsp. carrot juice or finely grated carrots
1/2 tsp. white pepper
1/2 tsp. chopped fresh parsley
4 tbsp. matzah meal vegetable oil spray.

In a large bowl, mix together carrots, onion, carrot juice, pepper and parsley. Add matzah meal slowly, mixing well. If mixture is not stiff (think lumpy cookie dough), add a bit more matzah meal.

Blueberry blobs a real treat

Spray a large frying pan liberally with oil. Drop about 2 tbsp. of carrot mixture at a time into the pan. Flatten and allow pancakes to cook over medium heat until golden, about 3 minutes. Turn and allow other side to become golden.

Remove pancakes from the pan and place on a plate or tray that is lined with paper towels. Serve immediately or place on oil-sprayed baking sheet and hold in a warm oven (275 degrees) for 15-20 minutes. Serves 4.

SHAYLA'S EGG-FREE PASSOVER BREAKFAST PANCAKES

1/4 cup matzah cake meal
3/4 cup potato starch
1/2 cup matzah meal
2-1/2 tsp. Passover baking powder
1-1/2 cups milk
1 small ripe banana, mashed
1/3 cup unsweetened applesauce
optional: 1/4 cup sliced berries or chopped apple and/or 1/4 cup chocolate chips

Mix together all dry ingredients. Stir in milk, banana and applesauce. Add fruit or other add-ins if desired. If too wet, add cake meal a teaspoon at a time. If too dry, add a bit more milk.

Heat an oiled griddle over medium heat. Drop batter by tablespoons onto griddle. Cook for 2-3 minutes or until surface has bubbles. Flip and continue cooking until lightly browned. Serve with jam, yogurt, honey or Passover syrup. Makes about 25 silver-dollar sized pancakes, or about 15 larger ones.

CHOCOLATE BLUEBERRY BLOBS

Source: Norene's Healthy Kitchen by Norene Gilletz. Whitecap Books, 2007. Used with permission.

These are amazing and rich, and the blueberries burst in your mouth. My kids love them!

2 cups fresh blueberries
8 oz. good-quality dark chocolate, broken into chunks

Line a baking tray or sheet with parchment paper. Rinse the blueberries well, and pat COMPLETELY dry. If there is any water on them, they will seize the chocolate and make it unusable.

Meanwhile, microwave the chocolate in a bowl on medium until melted, about 2 minutes, stirring every minute (or use a double boiler on the stove).

Remove the chocolate from the microwave. Let cool to lukewarm before gently mixing in the blueberries with a rubber spatula. Gently mix until the berries are well-coated with chocolate. Drop teaspoonfuls of the mixture onto the lined tray, about 2 inches apart. Refrigerate until firm, about 1 hour.

Notes: Keeps about a day in the refrigerator. Don't freeze. Yield: 30 pieces.

Gluten-free sweets

Nadene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Passover seems to strike a sense of panic in Jewish homemakers worldwide. Cooking and baking can be a daunting task, especially with dietary restrictions, endless meals to prepare and special family customs. But not anymore!

With A Taste of Tradition: Pesach - Anything's Possible! author Tamar Ansh presents an excellent collection of 350 wheat-free, gluten-free, non-gebrochts recipes, along with stunning, full-colour photos, truly proving that "anything's possible" when it comes to Passover baking and cooking.

Pesach- Anything's Possible! is available in Jewish bookstores or online at www.menuchapublishers.com. The new eBook version is available from Jewish E-books: www.jewish-e-books.com.

CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

Ansh writes, "I got this amazing recipe from Mrs. Rikva Thumim of Golders Green, London."

2 cups sugar
2 eggs
1 cup oil
2 packets, about 2 tbsp. vanilla sugar
3-1/4 cups very finely ground almonds (almost flour consistency)
1 cup potato starch
1-1/4 cups chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 350. Cream together sugar, eggs, and oil. Add in vanilla sugar, almonds, potato starch, and chocolate chips and mix well.

Freeze batter for 10 minutes to make it easier to form the cookies. It will be oily, but this is normal.

Make small balls out of the batter using your hands or a mini ice cream scooper. Place on a parchment paper- lined tray. DO NOT flatten cookies at all. They spread a lot in the baking process so leave lots of space between cookies.

Bake them for 12 minutes, until they are lightly browned and crinkled. Let cool a bit on the paper and then remove. Makes about 45 cookies – or so (hard to tell, as they get eaten very quickly!). Hide them quickly if you want some for later, and yes, these do freeze well!

INCREDIBLE APPLE MUFFINS

4 cups Granny Smith apples, peeled, cored and diced very small
1 cup sugar
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
2 large eggs, beaten
1/2 cup oil
2 tsp. vanilla
1-1/4 cups potato starch
2 tsp. baking soda
1 cup white raisins (optional)
1 cup chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 325. Toss apples with sugar and cinnamon. Set aside. Whisk eggs with oil and vanilla by hand.

Combine dry ingredients in a separate bowl. Set aside. Add apples to egg mixture. Stir in mixed dry ingredients by spoonfuls until well-combined. Mix in raisins and walnuts at the end.

Line muffin pans with baking paper muffin liners. Spray top of baking tins with non-stick spray if you have it. Fill each cup with batter almost until the top.

Bake 25-30 minutes until tester in centre comes out clean and muffins are light brown on top. Fluffy and scrumptious! Muffins fall slightly after they cool down. Freezes well. Makes 16 muffins

FAMOUS BROWNIES

6 eggs
2-2/3 cups sugar
1-1/2 cups potato starch
3/4 cup cocoa
3/4 cup oil
1 tsp. Passover vanilla
1 cup walnuts, coarsely chopped
1/2 cup coconut, optional

Chocolate Glaze:

1 cup powdered sugar (Passover icing sugar)
2 tbsp. oil
2 tbsp. hot water
2 tbsp. cocoa

Preheat oven to 350. Place eggs, sugar, potato starch, cocoa, oil and vanilla into a large bowl. Mix together until smooth. Add nuts and optional coconut.

Line a 9 x 13-in. pan with parchment baking paper and pour batter into pan.

Bake for 30 minutes, or until cake tester inserted into brownies' centre comes out mostly clean, and the top is light brown and crispy. Do not overbake, as brownies will become too dry; they should remain moist, although not mushy, in the centre.

Remove pan from oven immediately and cool completely.

In a separate small bowl, mix glaze ingredients with a spoon until smooth. Spread over cooled brownies. Allow to set for a few minutes, then slice.

Optional: Decorate each brownie with a walnut half. Makes 24 to 36 brownies.

Israeli technology helps Canadian farmers

Viva Sarah Press

KIBBUTZ AFIKIM, Israel — Canadian farmers are turning to an Israeli company to help them increase the milk production of their cows.

Israel's SAE Afikim, better known as Afimilk, is a world leader in computerized systems for dairy farm and herd management.

Across Canada, there are some 100 farms already hooked up to the Israeli dairy system. A team from Kibbutz Afikim is now shooting a film at Summitholm Holsteins farm in Lynden, Ont., to try to expand its activities.

"We found out that dairy farmers are most convinced by what their neighbours or friends or colleagues say," said Noa Yonish, Afimilk's marketing communication and market study manager.

"We are in North America to shoot a testimonial movie of real farmers who use our system successfully and are not shy about telling other people that it is good and works well," he added.

Bjarne Rune, vice-president of sales at Afimilk said, "The average Israeli cow will produce 12,000 litres per year. For comparison, in the U.S. and Canada, it's around 10,000 litres. The Israeli cow is significantly better, and it's not because of the cow, it's because of management. It's technology, knowledge – and we really have made a difference."

The sprawling kibbutz of Afikim is just south of the Sea of Galilee. The kibbutz has a few factories on site, but it is beside the small dairy shed that most of the action takes place.

It is here that R&D experts create hardware and software to monitor and direct the cows' performance. Machines beep, cows moo, and the radio pumps out soothing music (to keep the cows happy).

"Our company was founded because of one man's dream," Rune said, referring to his mentor, Eli Peles.

Peles, a self-taught engineer, came up with the world's first electronic milk meter some 25 years ago. It was a simple but revolutionary idea.

"Eli Peles decided to help his friends in the dairy farm," Rune said. "He wanted his friends to be able to do a better job and applied his engineering mind, and basically founded this company, all because of specific needs of the kibbutz."

Today, the Afimilk name is synonymous with dairy farm and herd management excellence. Afimilk's computerized milking systems can be found in more than 50 countries.

There's the AfiLab system – a small machine that analyzes the milk in real time, letting the farmer know the fat content, protein content and lactose content as the milk flows from the cow's teat.

Israel cuts contact with UN rights council

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel decided Monday to sever contact with the UN Human Rights Council after the international body decided to establish an international investigative committee on the West Bank settlements.

The council voted last Thursday to appoint a panel charged with evaluating the effects of Israeli settlement construction on Palestinian human rights in the West Bank and east Jerusalem.

The Foreign Ministry ordered Israel's ambassador to Geneva, Aharon Leshno-Yaar, to cut off contact with the council immediately, instructing him to ignore phone calls from the council's chief commissioner, Nabi Pilawai, a senior Israeli official said.

According to the text of the decision, the UN will "dispatch an independent international fact-finding mission, to be appointed by the president of the Human Rights Council, to investigate the implications of the Israeli settlements on the civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights of the Palestinian people throughout the occupied Palestinian territory, including east Jerusalem."

The committee's mandate will be to submit a report on the topic to the council. The decision also called on Israel "not to obstruct the process of investigation and to co-operate fully with the mission."

On Monday, Israel said it will bar the fact-finding team dispatched by the council from entering Israel and the West Bank to investigate settlement construction.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reacted harshly to the decision, calling the body a "hypocritical council with an automatic majority against Israel." He added that the council "should be ashamed of itself, and has nothing to do with human rights."

Netanyahu added that out of 91 decisions made by the UN body to date, 39 dealt with Israel. "Only three of the decisions dealt with Syria, and only one with Iran. It was enough to hear the Syrian ambassador speaking today about human rights to understand the extent which the council is out of touch with reality."

Thirty-six states voted in favour of the decision, while 10 states abstained, including the Czech Republic, Romania, Hungary, Poland, Costa Rica, Italy and Spain. The United States was the only country to vote against it.

Palestinian ambassador to the UN Ibrahim Khraishisaid said Israel's occupation should be condemned as a violation of human rights.

"We don't want to isolate Israel, but when we see that Israel hasn't stopped taking over our lands, we must act. If this situation continues, how will we be able to apply a two-state solution? The occupying power is violating international law," he added.

Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird said it was "incredibly disappointing" that the UN council had again singled out Israel for condemnation.

"Canada has stated on numerous occasions that final status issues need to be negotiated between the two parties, not by the United Nations," Baird said in a March 23 statement.

Aharon Leshno-Yaar

"This resolution is biased against Israel and doesn't address the complexity of issues in this region. This undermines the honest efforts to bring about a just and lasting peace between Israelis and Palestinians. We continue to call for direct negotiations between the two parties without preconditions."

Betty King, the U.S. ambassador to the UN in Geneva, said that the decision harmed efforts to restart negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians and would not help protect the human rights of Israelis and Palestinians. "We don't accept the legitimacy of construction in the settlements, but we are disturbed by this one-sided and biased decision," she said.

"Anyone who supports the creation of an independent Palestinian state must support efforts to renew negotiations and refrain from taking steps that harm this effort... This won't promote peace. It will only push the sides further away from one another," the ambassador added.

Syria's ambassador accused Israel of accelerating settlement construction, which he deemed a violation of the Geneva Conventions and an "act of piracy."

The decision was one of five approved by the council last Thursday that were critical of Israel.

Israel's Foreign Ministry said in response, "The Palestinians must understand that they can't have it both ways – they can't enjoy co-operation with Israel and at the same time initiate political clashes in international forums. Had the Palestinians wanted to solve the settlements issue, they would resume without delay a direct and unconditional negotiation on all core issues within the framework of a comprehensive agreement."

The Israeli official said: "The secretariat of the Human Rights Council and Nabi Pilawai sparked this process by establishing an international investigative committee on settlements, and we will thus not work with them anymore and will not appear before the council."

Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said Friday that the move by the UN body proves that the Palestinians do not want to renew negotiations with Israel. "We are dealing with Al Qaeda terror on the one hand and diplomatic terror by Abu Mazen on the other," Lieberman said, referring to PA President Mahmoud Abbas. Israel is also considering sanctions against the Palestinian Authority in response to the human rights council decision.

'A strong bond, a connection and commitment'

In Israel, politicians and Jewish Agency chair Natan Sharansky pointed to last week's terrorist attack in France as reinforcing the view that Jews in Israel and the Diaspora are connected.

"Jewish children were attacked in Toulouse solely because they and their parents sought to maintain their connection with Jewish tradition and the Jewish state," Sharansky said. "The enemies of the State of Israel and of the Jewish People are one and the same."

According to the Jewish Agency, the poll was conducted to ascertain the ties between Israeli and global Jewish communities and to determine the significance of those ties to Jewish unity. Its release coincided with the launch of the Jewish World Caucus, a group of 40 members of the Israeli Knesset.

The caucus "will strive to strengthen ties between the Jewish Diaspora and Israel through legislation and the increased dialogue on the subject of Diaspora-Israeli relations," the Jewish Agency said in a news release.

"A particular emphasis will be placed on deepening the bonds between young Jews abroad and in Israel, such as the connections engendered by programs including Birthright Israel and the Jewish Agency's Masa initiative" in which Diaspora Jews volunteer in Israel, study at Israeli institutions or experience professional internships. Some 10,000 Jews from around the world take part in Masa each year.

Silver suggested creation of the caucus should sensitize Israeli parliamentarians to the impact Israeli legislation has outside the country.

"Some of the policies... have to be looked at not just as Israeli issues, but issues that Jews care about," Silver said.

The poll supports the Jewish Agency view that ties between Israeli Jews and Diaspora Jews benefits both, Silver said.

"The programs we are trying to carry out, with the support of local federations, [such as] sending camp or campus mentors from Israel, or teachers as shlichim, or other programs that bring Jews to Israel, are intended to cement the relations between Jews here and Jews there. If anything, the poll substantiates that," Silver stated.

Aviva Zeltzer-Zubida, director of research, evaluation and measurement for the Jewish Agency, said the poll shows that Israelis "deeply value the Jewish family."

"There is a strong bond, a connection and commitment," between Israelis and other Jews, she said.

Zeltzer-Zubida said the Jewish Agency is running a pilot program aimed at building on the success of trips such as Birthright, which brings young Jews to Israel for 10 days for free.

Called Onward Israel, it will see young people spend four to eight weeks in the country, leading to a more "in-depth" experience, said Zeltzer-Zubida.

Onward Israel includes academic programs, internships or volunteer service, she added.

Joshua Berkman, associate director of communications for the Jewish Agency, said the organization is expecting 100 participants from Toronto in the inaugural cohort. They will participate in internships or community service projects in Bat Yam, while those taking the academic track will study at Ben-Gurion University's Eilat campus, he stated.

Then there's the Pedometer Plus that measures performance and behaviour changes in the cows.

And there's AfiWash – a programmable device for controlling the wash and disinfection system in milking parlours. Rune said Israel's lack of farming tradition gives it an edge. "Farmers are usually third, fourth, fifth, 10th generation farmers. And often they do what their fathers did and grandfathers did," he said. "Here, there is no tradition. When you take people from a different environment and drop them into farming, they have to look for tools that they don't have, and then they look to technology."

The numbers are impressive. Since 1977, AfiMilk has installed more than 5,500 management systems worldwide, more than 130,000 milk meters and more than five million ID tags.

Afimilk entered the Canadian market in 1995.

"I can go anywhere in the world – China, North America, Holland, Denmark –and everybody has heard about Israeli agriculture," Rune said.

Ardent supporter of Israel

That's why I am an ardent supporter of Israel in all instances [French for the different institutions that make up a country] and circumstances."

Mulcair's outspoken support for Israel was cited as a reason why some prominent New Democrats wouldn't support his leadership bid, but shortly after winning, he signalled his intention to keep Vancouver East MP Libby Davies as deputy party leader, despite her outspoken criticism of Israel and their previous clashes on the party's position on the Jewish state. The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) congratulated Mulcair on his victory and said it looked forward to working with him.

"Mr. Mulcair has enjoyed a strong relationship with the Jewish community, through his work at both the provincial and federal levels of government, and I am confident that under his leadership the friendship between the NDP and the Jewish community will continue to strengthen over the coming years," CIJA chair David Koschitzky said in a statement.

Mulcair beat out rival Brian Topp, the former party president, after receiving more than 57 per cent of the vote at the leadership convention in Toronto.

He now follows in the footsteps of the late Jack Layton and assumes control from interim leader Nycole Turmel.

The CJN hopes to have an interview with Mulcair in an upcoming issue.

Anne's sapling to Yad Vashem

A sapling from the chestnut tree that Anne Frank wrote about in her diary will be planted at Yad Vashem. The sapling, donated by the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam, was taken from the 150-year-old tree that was toppled by a storm in August 2010. A fungus and insect infestation had weakened the tree. At Yad Vashem, the sapling will be planted near the Children's Memorial and International School for Holocaust Studies. Saplings have been sent to institutions around the world, including to Montreal. The young Frank made several references to the tree in her famous diary, which she kept for the two years she and her family hid in the attic. She died at Bergen-Belsen in March 1945.

Israel helps Gazans with fuel shortage

Israel sent 450,000 litres of gasoline and diesel fuel purchased by the Palestinian Authority into the Gaza Strip through the Kerem Shalom border crossing on March 23. The shipment is meant to provide temporary relief for the fuel shortage in the Gaza strip, which started after Egypt cut off all shipments of fuel to Gaza. Senior Hamas officials blamed Egyptian intelligence services, claiming they were behind cutting off fuel to Gaza, in order to force the Hamas government into a deal with Fatah. Hamas ceased importing fuel from Israel more than a year ago.

Investors urged to consider Israeli infrastructure fund

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Pinchas "Pinny" Cohen has been to Toronto before, so he's got a good idea of the lay of the land when it comes to private equity investments.

Years ago, when he headed his first "big project," planning Highway 6, Israel's first toll road, he came to Canada to witness first hand the way Highway 407 was being run. The Canadian-built thoroughfare had a good reputation internationally, as it was the first to calculate and collect fees electronically, without the need for traffic-slowing stations at regular intervals.

It was the first place "I came to see, to meet and to know," Cohen explained during a recent visit to Toronto.

Aecon, a big player in infrastructure engineering, which upgraded Highway 407, went on to own a one-quarter interest in the Israeli highway. Though that financial connection has ended, Cohen believes Canadians will again be interested in Israeli projects.

During his 2-1/2-day visit last week, he was touting the Israel-based NOY Infrastructure and Energy Fund as an attractive – and lucrative – way for Canadians to invest in Israel.

The fund, he said, is relatively new. It was launched in May 2011 with 570 million shekels ($160 million US), and since then, it has raised another 1.6 billion shekels. The fund took a 49 per cent stake in Highway 6, a 140-kilometre road that runs more or less from Haifa to Be'er Sheva and bypasses the more congested routes near Tel Aviv. It has been "very profitable," he said.

That investment has generated between 11 and 13 per cent annual return, while the fund's other four investments are also doing well.

Noy focuses on Israeli infrastructure projects, which Cohen believes is something that should interest high-worth Canadian investors. Israel is experiencing a growing economy and the country's infrastructure – its roads, power plants and energy sector – have to be upgraded to keep up, he said.

The government is putting a lot of money into infrastructure and is encouraging public and private partnerships, so the road is open to build upon Noy's current roster of successful investments, Cohen said.

In addition to Highway 6, Noy has put its money into a light rail system in Israel's north, it has invested in two substantial solar energy projects, and it is involved in a large "campus" in the Negev Desert for the Israeli military that will be used to train soldiers.

Noy has a couple of crucial selling points, Cohen explained. It already has an impressive list of well-known Israeli investors, including individuals and institutions who have put their money into the fund; its investment team is experienced and respected; and it has a record of successful ventures so far.

According to Ha'aretz, "Along with Pinny Cohen two investment managers with experience in infrastructure were to head the fund as partners: Ran Shelach, a consultant at TASC Strategic Consulting and a former credit manager at Bank Leumi, and Gilad Boshvitz, who had been an investment manager at the Amitim consortium of pension funds and business development manager at Etgal Holdings, a company that develops and manages infrastructure investments. For all three, Noy has provided a new experience."

Cohen, an attorney by profession, served as CEO of tycoon Lev Leviev's Africa Israel Investments from 1998 to 2006, as chair of Tshuva Holdings between 2006 and 2009, and in 2009, became a partner in the privately run America Israel real estate firm along with Migdal Group and Israel Discount bank.

Pinchas "Pinny" Cohen

Noy itself was created by Poalim Capital Markets, a subsidiary of Israel's Bank Hapoalim, and Clal Insurance, an arm of IDB Holdings Group.

Cohen expects the fund will attract mostly Jewish investors in Canada, who already have an affinity for Israel.

Toronto, he said, "has a strong business community with a strong relationship with Israel."

Investors are being asked to look at long-term investments of more than 10 years, but he expects "people will get a nice return on their money, more than Canadian returns on infrastructure." He suggests that will be in the 12 to 15 per cent range.

High net worth individuals will be asked to put $1 million or more into the fund; institutions and corporations, $10 million.

Noy is exploring new projects, Cohen said, including a new power station running on natural gas largely extracted from Israeli sources, a desalination plant and a Jerusalem to Tel Aviv "fast lane," in which motorists pay for the privilege of avoiding traffic.

The desalination project has the added benefit of promoting peace, Cohen stated. Fresh water is a major challenge in the Middle East, and if the supply is increased, fresh water becomes less of an issue in peace negotiations.

But that's merely an added bonus. For Noy, it's the quality of the project that counts.

"It's not a charity," he stressed. "It's a good investment opportunity."

Israel, EU sign 'open skies' agreement

Zohar Blumenkrantz
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Israel and the European Union (EU) last week concluded an "open skies" aviation agreement aimed at reducing airfares to and from Israel and increasing competition. The head of the Israel Civil Aviation Authority, Giora Rom, signed the deal after three days of negotiations with EU representatives.

The two sides have been discussing such a deal since late 2008. If approved by Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz, it will take effect on April 1, 2013.

The deal will be phased in over a five-year period, with each new phase going into effect in late March.

The new agreement will replace existing bilateral agreements between Israel and each EU nation, which specify the destinations and frequency of flights as well as the airlines permitted to fly them.

A set number of weekly flights to certain destinations will be added every year. At the end of the five-year period, there will be full competition on all routes between Israel and the EU, and every airline from the EU or Israel will be allowed to fly to any destination within the region as many times as it wants.

The agreement distinguishes between flights that terminate in Israel or the EU and that continue on to a final destination. Such traffic using a European airport as a connection to farther destinations, such as the United States or the Far East, has become quite common in the past decade. This has hurt Israeli airlines, as they're not members of any international airline alliances.

The EU is Israel's most important destination for flights, with 57 per cent of all Israeli international passenger flights going to the EU. There are now direct flights from Israel to 16 EU nations.

Another section of the agreement addresses harmonizing aviation laws between Israel and the EU, such as the implementation of procedures before flying disabled persons. The new agreement will force Israeli airlines to comply with European rules, which will entail significant spending.

Katz will meet next week with representatives of Israeli airlines to discuss the agreement.

Mapping the suburban moment

Montreal holds a mythic status in the minds of many Canadian Jews, representing what would once have been called the hoipt shtot – the capital city – of the country's Jewish literary tradition. Although economic power and the power of numbers were ceded years back to other centres, the literary life of the city retains its own unique character.

Of writers who came of age after World War II, Nancy Richler is among the most compelling. Her breakthrough book, Your Mouth Is Lovely, takes place in pre-revolutionary Russia, and explores a mother's loss and self-transformation in the era of the gulag. Canada presents itself, as an American with Canadian roots once put it, as "little more than a sea of meaningless mist."

Richler's new novel, The Imposter Bride (Harper Collins), puts her back on home ground – a Montreal native who lived in Vancouver for many years, she moved back to the city shortly before the new book's release. The novel's distinguishing characteristic is its moment – the postwar years when the large, increasingly successful Jewish community received a substantial group of Holocaust survivors. These people were greene to long-time Montrealers – a source of both pride and shame, in their cultural accomplishments and dark history.

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

This period is largely a blank in mainstream Canadian literature, including its Jewish English-language component. Major Yiddish writers and their counterparts in the visual arts captured the era, but most great Yiddish postwar work went untranslated.

A younger generation, best represented by Nancy Richler's cousin, Mordecai, abandoned ship, making careers for themselves in Toronto, with the CBC, the major newspapers, the National Film Board, or further afield in England and New York.

The Imposter Bride fills in the gap caused by a dearth of fiction about the postwar years.

The novel rests on a neat narrative turn: the arrival of a female survivor named Lily Azerov, whose identity includes a mystery, and whose actions in her short time in Montreal leave great upheaval in their wake. We receive her story from the daughter she abandons, and it is through Ruthie that Richler moves her story to a later decade of Montreal Jewish life, which has itself been little explored. This is the moment after the wholesale abandonment of the old downtown neighbourhood, in favour of modern flats and work in the western suburbs. Without didacticism, Richler conveys the shifts in the 1950s that presented new social and economic possibilities for the city's Jews.

Irving Layton, who himself lived in Côte Saint-Luc, treated the area to some of his characteristic dark satire. His monuments to suburban life include the "steam shovel" as it "prepares an accommodation/ and an easy way out/ for excrement." But Richler tells her story from Ruthie's youthful point of view, and she is a curious rather than corrosive observer of her surroundings.

Among the fine surprises in The Imposter Bride is Richler's easy, detailed way with time and place, whether the postwar downtown or suburbia of a later decade. As a newly arrived immigrant with a secret past, Lily Azerov is in constant retreat from her new husband's family. Before her well-meaning mother-in-law she struggles with a feeling of "strangeness that overwhelmed her" when she tried to "interact as a person normally would when buying bread in a store, or talking to her mother-in-law in the kitchen or going about any other business of daily life."

When Lily suddenly disappears, the focus of the narrative shifts to Ruthie, Richler's representative of the postwar generation. Where Mordecai Richler's The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz sketched the life of the downtown quarter – its economic struggles and wartime enthusiasms – The Imposter Bride depicts the suburban chapter that follows it. In a wonderful vignette set in Ruthie's Jewish day school, the portrayal of one of her teachers, himself a new European arrival, allows Richler to trace the fault lines of a community that is assimilating and abandoning much of its ethnic, even its local prewar heritage. Mr. C's angst troubles the mothers of Ruthie's friends, but Ruthie acknowledges his strength, "a hard, dry strength." The newcomer-establishment divide inevitably erupts, as the children make their teacher "aware in countless other ways how little we respected him, how unpopular he was as a teacher, referring to him by initial only when we were talking amongst ourselves, as if he didn't even have a name."

By the novel's close Ruthie looks back on these childhood experiences from a position of understanding, as she recovers key elements of her mother's story. The Imposter Bride's take on these themes is unfailingly thoughtful and revealing. It offers a window on a place and time not so far removed from us, which is exceedingly hard to find between the covers of a book.

Norman Ravvin's recent books include a novel, The Joyful Child (Gaspereau) and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein, co-edited with Sherry Simon (McGill-Queen's).

Breaking away from the Satmar

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Deborah Feldman, 25, considers herself a new and different person today, cut from the template of rebellion.

Born into a haredi family in Williamsburg, a Satmar enclave in Brooklyn, New York, she spurned her childhood values and beliefs and embraced modernity.

"I'm an outspoken woman with feminist and liberal politics," she said in an interview to promote her memoir, Unorthodox: The Scandalous Rejection of My Hasidic Roots, which was published last month by Simon & Schuster. "There is no room for me in a fundamentalist Jewish community. I rebelled so I could achieve authenticity and self-determination."

Having jettisoned ultra-Orthodoxy for a secular lifestyle, Feldman knows very few people like herself. She not only tilted at windmills by breaking out of the Satmar cocoon, but had the audacity to go public about her spiritual journey.

Feldman was raised by strictly religious grandparents after her parents parted ways and her mother abandoned the community. She was never close to her mentally disabled father, who played a minimal role in her upbringing.

None too happy with her restrictive and cloistered existence, Feldman broadened her horizons with visits to a public library. Novels such as Pride and Prejudice and Anne of Green Gables touched a chord, refining her imagination and fostering a spirit of rebelliousness.

At 17, she found herself in an arranged marriage, wed to a man whom she barely knew. Dysfunctional on all levels, the marriage produced a son when she was 19, but broke up under the pressure of incompatibility.

Deborah Feldman

Feeling trapped but not helpless, she summoned up the courage to break away from the Satmars. "I think I always knew I couldn't make it work," she said. "Mentally and emotionally, I was leaving the community from a young age."

Feldman objected to every conceivable aspect of the Satmar regimen. "Gender roles. Restrictions in education. Racism. Homophobia. Anti-Zionism. And more."

Asked what kind of a person she would have been had she stayed within the Satmar fold, she said, "I wouldn't have been alive."

She added, "I feel very liberated. I feel joyful and lucky."

Not surprisingly, Feldman's mother supported her decision to leave. When asked about her father's attitude, she replied, "He has never been aware of any aspect of my development."

Now a single mother, she lives in New York City with her six-year-old boy and attends Sarah Lawrence College in Bronxville, N.Y.

She began thinking of writing a book about her experiences after enrolling at Sarah Lawrence College. "But it took a lot of convincing on the part of my professors and fellow students to get the courage to write it," she noted.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

AUSLANDER, LANDSBERG TO HEADLINE NEW TORONTO JEWISH BOOK FESTIVAL

Shalom Auslander

American author-essayist Shalom Auslander and Toronto writer-activist Michele Landsberg have been chosen to headline the new Toronto Jewish Book Festival in early June, the hosting Koffler Centre of the Arts announced last week.

Auslander is an ironic and irreverent American Jewish writer whose religion-bashing memoir Foreskin's Lament (2007) first catapulted him to international prominence. He is coming to Toronto to speak about his recent first novel, Hope: A Tragedy, which brings diarist Anne Frank back to life as a crotchety old woman hiding in an attic in New York state.

Auslander is iconoclastic and wickedly funny. Earlier this month, when CBC Radio asked him what prompted him to reinvent Anne Frank, he quipped, "A lot of very good marijuana and prescription medication." On a more serious note, he explained that writing the "darkly funny" novel "was my way of taking a flashlight and shining it in the dark corners to see what's there."

Landsberg, feminist icon and former columnist for 25 years for the Toronto Star, will speak on her new collection of essays, Writing the Revolution (published by Second Story Press). She launched the book last fall with her son Avi Lewis, daughter-in-law Naomi Klein and city alderman Kristyn Wong-Tam.

The festival will also feature recording-industry legend Bernie Finklestein on his new memoir True North: A Life Inside the Music Business; a tribute to Canadian cultural icons Celia Franca and John Hirsch by authors Carol Bishop-Gwyn and Fraidie Martz; and programs with authors Seymour Mayne, B. Glen Rotchin, Sara Tauben, Morley Torgov, George Jonas, Nora Gold, Lilian Nattel, Anne Dublin and others.

The festival succeeds the 34-year-old Toronto Jewish Book Fair and culminates in the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards. Bram and Bluma Appel Salon, Toronto Reference Library, June 4 to 7. Admission free, everyone welcome. Full details soon at www.kofflerarts.org.

Winning Play Gets Reading: Haunted, the play by Daniel Karasik that won the 2011 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition, tells the story of a university professor, recently widowed, who enters a romance with a rabbi as her daughter claims to see her father's ghost. A reading, directed by Alisa Palmer, features Sascha Cole, Rosemary Dunsmore, Sarah English and Jordan Pettle. Jews in the Red Army: The exhibit Lives of the Great Patriotic War: Untold Stories of Soviet Jewish Soldiers in the Red Army during WWII, is on view at Congregation Darchei Noam, 864 Sheppard Ave. W., until April 4.

Names in the News: Carl Reiner, the celebrated American writer, actor and comedian, marked his 90th birthday last week. The Bronx-born son of a Jewish watchmaker from Romania, Reiner worked with Mel Brooks, Neil Simon and other writers on Sid Caesar's Your Show of Shows, developed and acted in television's The Dick Van Dyke Show, and performed with Brooks in The 2,000 Year Old Man. Among many other career credits, he also appeared in The Russians Are Coming and It's a Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad World.

Author broke with Satmar community

Unorthodox has been praised by critics, with Publishers Weekly having described it as "engaging" and Library Journal having called it "quite absorbing."

Much to Feldman's satisfaction, her mother is a fan. "She has been incredibly supportive and helpful," Feldman said.

As expected, she has been vilified in Satmar circles.

"Rage is an understatement. I believe the fury comes in part from the fact that I'm a woman. Speaking out is always forbidden, but from a woman it is considered unacceptable. Much of the hate is coming from men, some of whom even have pretended to be women."

With the publication of Unorthodox, Feldman has completely angered and alienated all her Satmar friends and acquaintances. She sees no way back, saying it would impossible to maintain such bonds today.

Far from being intimidated by their ferocious response, Feldman is currently writing a sequel.

She looks forward to improving her skills as a writer and hopes to establish an organization that provides help and resources to women like herself.

Photographer portrays Israel in all its shades

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The photographs of Harel Stanton portray Israel in all its moods and permutations.

"My photos are not postcards," said Stanton, an Israeli on the staff of Masa Acher, Israel's version of National Geographic magazine. "They show daily life in Israel and the diversity of Israel's population."

Harel Stanton

Stanton, whose work is currently being exhibited in New York City, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Philadelphia, will be in Toronto from April 1 to 4.

Although he will not be exhibiting in Toronto, copies of his prints will be available for purchase during his visit.

On April 2 at 7:30 p.m., he will deliver a lecture at Ulpanat Orot School.

An eclectic photographer, he specializes in an array of topics ranging from Israel's landscapes to faith and culture in the Jewish state.

When possible, he likes to reach beyond clichés about Israel.

"Photography has been my passion and my dream since I was a boy," said Stanton, who was born in 1968. "From a social point of view, I regard it as a medium to bring awareness and sensitivity to cultures."

After graduating from the College of Art and Design in Tel Aviv, he worked as a press photographer for Hadashot and Ha'aretz.

Photographer Harel Stanton specializes in portraying Israel's diverse population.

For the past number of years, he has taught photography in Israel and gone on lecture tours in Europe, the United States and Latin America.

A contributor to foreign publications running the gamut from Geo to National Geographic, Stanton is also known for his multimedia presentations and workshops.

Putting a Smile on seniors' faces for 40 years

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Smile Theatre Company, a troupe of actors who perform at seniors facilities throughout the Golden Horseshoe and beyond is celebrating its 40th anniversary with a special evening on April 16.

"When actors Tom Kneebone and Dinah Christie started the company four decades ago, I do not think they could have imagined the impact it would have on the lives of the hundreds of thousands of individuals who have shared in the joy of the inspiring productions that have been created for Smile Theatre Company," current president Briane Nasimok says.

Nasimok, an actor, writer and director, who sat on the Factory Theatre board for three years before taking up the position at Smile Theatre, started his career as an operatic mute for the Canadian Opera Company and then became a standup comic before becoming a writer and producer for both television and theatrical events including the highly successful Gilda's Club Gala.

After paying his mortgage off, he was able to come back to his first love: theatre. When encouraged to run for president of Smile Theatre, he did, and he hasn't looked back.

He said he is quickly learning how hard it is to raise money for theatre, especially when you are talking about theatre for seniors. What they have been good at is attracting respected actors including seasoned veterans Susan Cuthbert and Paula Wolfson and up-and-coming theatre stars such as Gabi Epstein, who was nominated for a Dora Mavor Moore Award last year. The company prides itself on hiring actors who are sensitive to their audience and spend time talking with them after the show.

On April 16, to celebrate their 40th anniversary, the company is presenting A Taste of Smile Theatre – an evening of music, good food and fun beginning at 6 p.m. with cocktails followed by a dinner and show

A scene from Lavender Blue starring Sara Farb and Bruce Tubbe and written by Dinah Christie.
[Warren MacDonald photo]

"Members of the Smile troupe will be performing excerpts from some of our productions at First Canadian Place," Nasimok said. "BMO Financial Group will open its exclusive 68th floor venue for this special occasion and co-founder Dinah Christie will be joining us."

In fact, the current show, Lavender Blue starring Sara Farb, was written by Christie. The company does three shows a year, the next being The Shooting of Dan McGrew based on the poem by Robert Service.

Smile Theatre was incorporated as a registered charity in 1972. Over half a million seniors have seen the 160 productions that tour 38 weeks a year. Nasimok said the company develops and produces work principally from a musical theatre tradition with Canadian themes, which resonate with their target audiences by dignifying audiences with professional quality entertainment that engages, rejuvenates, rekindles the imagination and encourages positive transformation.

"All our performers and stage managers will attest to the extraordinary moments that can occur both during and after the show: someone who hasn't spoken in years will suddenly try to speak to the performers, or will suddenly begin to sing along; someone who can no longer speak can still laugh; someone else who has virtually lost the ability to move will attempt to reach out; someone will "applaud" by waving their one usable hand in the air."

The company has been going to Baycrest for years. "Baycrest is doing some research on how music affects the cognitive abilities and memories of the elderly. So, our artistic director Jim Betts is going to work with Baycrest on this," Nasimok said.

Tickets for the April 16 fundraising event are $125. For more information, visit www.smiletheatre.com.

Boys of summer gearing up for new baseball season

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The weather is changing and once again it's time for the Jewish boys of summer to turn their backs on winter and prepare for a new baseball season.

The regular season commences March 28-29, when Seattle plays Oakland in a pair of games in Tokyo.

But the Milwaukee Brewers are already winners upon learning in late February that "The Hebrew Hammer," left-fielder Ryan Braun, last year's National League MVP, had his 50-game suspension overturned by baseball arbitrator Shyam Das.

Shockingly, last fall in one of those "Say- it-ain't-so, Joe" moments, the now-28-year-old highly regarded star tested positive for a performance-enhancing drug. What a relief for a club which had already lost Prince Fielder to free agency for the princely sum of $214 million (all figures US) to Detroit.

The son of an Israeli-born Jewish father and a Catholic mother who made his fourth consecutive NL All-Star team when he hit .332, smacked 33 taters, drove in 111 runs and stole 33 bases is now the fourth Jewish player to capture the MVP award. He joins all-time greats Sandy Koufax of the Dodgers, Hank Greenberg of the Tigers and Al Rosen of the Indians in holding the distinction.

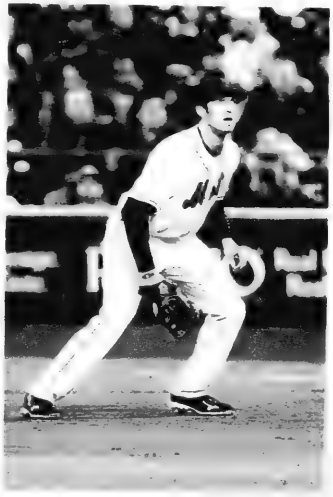
Boston may possibly have three Jews in the lineup in 2012: Kevin Youkilis, Ryan Kalish and Ryan Lavarnway. Youkilis, 33, who can play first or third, has been injury-prone the past two years but will bat third or fourth in the Red Sox lineup after a year in which he had only 431 at-bats but whacked 32 doubles, 17 home runs and had 80 RBIs, but saw his batting average drop to .258 from .307, perhaps due to sports-hernia issues.

Kalish, 24, an outfielder, is presently on the 40-man roster, but due to injury in 2011 had only 86 at-bats and hit a paltry .209 at AAA Pawtucket. In 2010, however, he was with Boston where he managed 163 at-bats and hit .252, drove in 24 and slammed four homers.

Lavarnway, a 24-year-old catcher, was brought up late last season and went to the plate for the Red Sox only 39 times, hitting .231 and impressing with a pair of homers. The Yale grad earned the call-up when no other player in the Boston organization demonstrated more power. Between AA Portland and AAA Pawtucket, he went deep 32 times, drove in 93, and hit .290 in 116 games.

Cleveland second-sacker Jason Kipnis was a second-round pick in 2009 out of Arizona State. If all goes well, two days after his 25th birthday on April 3, he'll start against the Blue Jays at home. He came up last July and in 136 at-bats hit a respectable .272 with nine doubles, seven homers and 19 RBIs. And here's one for Ripley's Believe it or Not: Kipnis became the first Indians' second baseman to hit a homer in four consecutive games on Aug. 3. The only other Cleveland player to do so was Jewish third baseman Al Rosen in his rookie year. Precisely one week later, Kipnis had a five-hit, four-run game.

Ryan Braun



Ike Davis

The Twins have added a second Jewish player to their roster to go along with third baseman Danny Valencia. Right-handed hurler Jason Marquis, who spent his entire 12-season major league career in the National League, is bringing his act to Minnesota to perform at pitcher-friendly Target Field.

The 33-year-old will likely be fourth or fifth in the rotation and, being a sinker-ball pitcher, will keep his infielders constantly on alert. By today's standards his one-year pact at $3 million is a bargain.

Last season, Marquis went 8-5 with an ERA of 3.95 with the Washington Nationals before being traded to the Arizona Diamondbacks on July 30, where he was 0-1 and saw his season ERA rise to 4.43. Now in the AL, he won't have to go to the plate but, interestingly, he was one of the top hitting pitchers in the NL and was on occasion used as a pinch-hitter. Marquis missed the last six weeks of the season with a broken right leg after being hit by a line drive.

Valencia, 27, is coming off a season in which he hit .246 with 15 home runs and 72 RBIs. The Twins are hoping he can improve on his rookie season in 2010, when his batting average was .311 in 322 at-bats. He hits lefthanders much better than righties and is a dead pull hitter with outstanding bat speed. At six-foot-six and 220 pounds, he has lots of power potential. Valencia was raised in Boca Raton, Fla., and is the son of a Jewish mother and a Cuban father. He was raised Jewish, attended Hebrew school and had a bar mitzvah.

Sam Fuld has finally, at age 30, found a home as a utility outfielder who brings excitement to the game. The five-foot-10 sparkplug can lead off, steal a base, and make eye-popping snags in left field. With Tampa Bay last season, he came to the plate 308 times and hit .240 with 18 doubles, five triples, three homers and 27 RBIs. He won't strike fear into the hearts of opposition pitchers, but being an agitator and a base threat with speed that allowed him to steal 20 bases in 2011, he can distract and annoy entire infields.

A self-injecting diabetic – in dugouts during games – the former Cub is a fan favourite.

The Texas Rangers' Jewish duo is back again with Ian Kinsler, 29, at second and Scott Feldman on the mound. You can't define the former by his mediocre .255 batting average in 2011, since Kinsler, who is most often used as a leadoff hitter, had unusual power, going deep 32 times and adding 34 doubles along with 77 RBIs. Kinsler can also create havoc with his feet, having stolen 30 bases and scored 121 runs.

Feldman, now 29, was out much of last year, but in limited service, he went 2-1 and had an ERA of 3.94 in 11 games. A former starter, the Hawaiian resident occasionally comes on in relief and only took the ball as a starter twice last year while working 32 innings. Texas tried to trade Feldman last season, but his contract is heavy and its movement clauses are tight. He will most likely be their primary long man who does a fair amount of mopping up.

New York first baseman Ike Davis, the son of former major-league pitcher Ron Davis and Jewish mother Millie from Lithuania, will start at first base for the Mets and likely bat cleanup. He missed much of last season with a serious ankle injury after colliding with teammate David Wright in pursuit of a pop fly in May. He was off to what may have been an all-star season when with only 129 at bats he was hitting .302 and had eight doubles, seven homers and drove in 25 – which matches his present age. The moribund Mets, who finished 25 games out last year, need a healthy season from the six-foot-four, 230-pound Edina, Minn., native who, for his size, is sure-handed around the bag.

Arizona's bullpen ranked 14th in the majors last season, and for relief in 2012, the Diamondbacks acquired left-handed reliever Craig Breslow, 31, from the Oakland A's.

In the past Breslow quelled uprisings, or tried to, in Boston, Cleveland, and Minnesota. Last year, he was 0-2, but in 67 appearances he sported an ERA of 3.79. Hence, his salary on a one-year pact for the upcoming season is close to $1.8 million, which was negotiated without going to arbitration.

The New Haven, Conn., native is a strikeout pitcher who in his 295-game career has fanned 235 in 279 innings. He has one more asset: Breslow led all relievers in the majors with five pickoffs.

The Dodgers signed veteran Jewish left-handed reliever John Grabow to a minor-league contract this past winter. The 33-year-old went 3-1 last season with a 4.76 ERA in 62.1 innings with the Cubs. He works especially well with runners in scoring position.

Two other hopefuls on this year's rosters to watch for are pitcher Michael Schwimer of the Phillies and infielder Josh Satin of the Mets, both of whom had a cup of coffee in the majors last season.

Journalist calls for 'Zionist BDS'

Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON — Should Jews shun other Jews? And should they shun Jews who call on Jews to shun other Jews?

Peter Beinart's call in New York Times on March 19 for a boycott of goods manufactured in West Bank settlements reignited a debate not just about what works and doesn't when it comes to advancing a two-state solution, but also about what should and should not be said during the debate.

Beinart, a journalist and essayist whose book, The Crisis of Zionism, is about to come out, tried to cast his call in pro-Israel terms.

"If Israel makes the occupation permanent and Zionism ceases to be a democratic project, Israel's foes will eventually overthrow Zionism itself," he wrote.

Beinart referred to his boycott proposal as "Zionist BDS" – a play on the pro-Palestinian boycott, divestment and sanctions movement targeting all of Israel, which Beinart firmly condemned in his Times essay as an effort to dismantle the Jewish state.

The pushback was immediate and came from multiple camps in the Israel debate: those who rejected Beinart's thesis but sought to engage him and those who think his latest call places him beyond the pale. More pushback came from advocates of a broader boycott movement targeting all of Israel.

Peter Beinart

Beinart has been a high-profile figure in the debates over Israel ever since he penned a much-discussed 2010 essay in The New York Review of Books suggesting that what he depicted as an Israeli slide away from democratic values would alienate American Jewish youth. The essay won him plaudits from the pro-Israel left.

Beinart is scheduled to be a featured speaker at this week's J Street national conference. But even the dovish J Street was cool to his boycott proposal. Its president, Jeremy Ben-Ami, said that boycotting settlements was unlikely to yield positive results.

"We favour a border not a boycott. We want to get the political process going to arrive at a border," he said.

Ben-Ami hastened to note, however, that the idea of boycotting settlements was not out of place in the Israeli discourse. Another J Street conference keynoter, he noted, was Amos Oz, the widely respected Israeli novelist who has signed onto a letter supporting Israeli artists who refuse to perform in the West Bank settlement of Ariel.

"It's a legitimate point of view that a lot of passionate two-state Zionists share," Ben-Ami said. "And Peter is within the mainstream in Israel."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of Canada's Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, called Beinert's position "untenable" on multiple fronts.
